THE CHARGE OF THE BRIGHT BRIGADE.

Round the room, round the room,
Round the room, onward,
Like a tee-totum
Revolved the one hundred.

Like a tee-totum
Revolved the one hundred,
For all were tipsy.
And no one had blundered,
"Onward the Bright Brigade!
All around!"  said
Sir Joe the undied.

Round then the Bright Brigade,
No one the least dismayed—
Some—for the ladies' favor
They never blundered:
Not theirs to make reply,
Not theirs to scan nor sly,
Theirs but full round to fly,
So round and round the room
Revolved the one hundred.

Mirrors to right of them,
Mirrors to left of them,
Mirrors in front of them,
Flowers unnumbered.
Lovely, in rich attire,
Eyes as bright as day,
Partners—all gay as they,
Into fast fun rude.
Round the one hundred.

Rose all their arms so bare,
Flew all their skirts in air,
Sweeping those sitting there,
Whirling and spinning while Lookers-on wondered:
Trod on and pushed along,
Some looking quite forlorn,
Some of their dresses torn,
Till they had reached their chairs,
Spun for two hours.

Gas-lights to right of them,
Gas-lights to left of them,
Gas-lights above them,
By glass pendants rendered
Laughing and blinding so,
At seats all rushing so,
Heated and out of breath,
And from that figure there.
Now all have reached a chair,
All that are really left
Of that one hundred.

When will the next begin?
O that enchanting spin!
How old folks wondered!
How they love so,
In that true pleasure, O,
Lovely one hundred!

Smith and Brown, running opposite ways around a corner, struck each other. "Oh dear, how you make my head ring!" said Smith. "That's a sign it'll rain now," said Brown. "But didn't you ring it?" "No," "That's a sign it's cracked," replied his friend.

Old Parson M., of Torrigford, was a queer sort of a man. One time, when his congregation had most of them dressed themselves for the afternoon up the startled them, as well as their ideas of propriety, by asking, in his loudest tone:

"What's the price of butter?"

To another time, some strangers coming to church with him, the congregation paid more attention to them than they did to him. Losing all patience he stopped and said:

"Those who in my pew are cousins from H——, so you needn't stare at them any more!"

Her legions now, as in the ancient time.
They still go forth, their mission still to prod!

SPANISH BULL-FIGHTS.

THE bull-fight is the national sport of Spain. It is what cricket and races are to the English, lotteries to the Italians, music to the Germans. In every principal city there is an arena for the purpose, and in many of them, on Sundays and saints' days, the fight in the arena takes place after mass in the cathedral.

The circus is packed with spectators, munching oranges and cakes. The performers troop in and make their salutations and retire. When all is ready, the presiding officer waves his handkerchief, and a bull, loosed from a narrow stall, and startled by the sudden sound of trumpets, rushes into the arena. There stands before him perhaps a single athlete. The animal regards him, then throws clouds of dust into the air, lowers his head, and rushes at him. The man stoops, dodges, plunges beneath the bull, and escapes like a flash between his legs. The astonished bull bellows amidst the huzzas of the admiring spectators, and turns to follow his adversary, when he confronts a horseman mounted on a thorough-bred steed and armed with a short lance.

This new tormentor wheels around the poor beast, raps him on the nose, pricks him in the flanks, and worries him into a rage. At last the bowels of the horse are ripped out by the horns of the bull, and he falls. The dexterous caballero narrowly escapes the same fate by the aid of a crowd of footmen, who rush into the arena and distract the bull's attention with their red banners.

Again, a man appears on stilts which raise him half a yard from the ground. They are lashed strongly to his legs, and one misstep would settle his fate; but he runs about the weary and unwieldy animal, dances before him, waves the red flag in his eyes, and finally kills him with a thrust of a sword.

When an unusually vigorous beast seems to be getting the better of his biped fellow-creatures, the assistants bring out a long pole armed with a sickle, and standing at a safe distance, cut his hom-strings; and on his bleeding stumps he fights on until he is fairly and chivalrously killed by a legitimate blow on the head.

Every time a bull is killed the carcass is dragged out by mules, and the arena is freshly sprinkled to conceal the bloody traces of the struggle, while the brilliantly-dressed throng of spectators buzz with applause and impatience.

SPANISH BULL-FIGHTS—SOMERSAULT ON THE BULL'S HORNS.

It is as if the ladies and gentlemen of Murray Hill resorted to the precincts of the slaughter-houses to see the blood flow.

The sport begins again. A fresh bull enters the arena and finds a crowd of unhappy negroes in fantastic dresses seated on a row of chairs directly across his path. He plunges at them, and they defend themselves with lances; but they are tossed about in the air with their chairs, creating a scene of infinite amusement to the spectators. When any one is thrown to the ground he rolls himself up like a hedgehog, knowing that though he may get some terrible thrusts, the bull will soon leave a motionless object to pursue the livelier adversaries around him.

Another company of men, eight or ten in number, are trained to rush into the arena and fall upon the bull, and hold him almost immovable, merely by the grasp of their hands, while one of their number, seizing his horns, lifts himself into the air, feet uppermost, upon the animal's head. Sometimes fire-works are fastened to the animal, and he is singed and scorched into the requisite fury.

The illustrations of these scenes which we present are from designs by GUSTAVE DORÉ. A French gentleman who visited Spain with him describes a female matador, who was then exciting the enthusiasm of the people at Seville. She was a young woman of twenty-eight or thirty years, a brunette, well-proportioned, robust, and full of energy. Her costume was like that of the dancing-girls of the theatres. She bore a flag and a sword; and after provoking the bull by the waving of her flag and her garments, and wearying him with his fruitless attacks upon her, she assailed him in front and killed him with a thrust of her sword in his forehead; and then gracefully acknowledged the enthusiastic applause of the spectators.

Christian Spain adopted this sport from the Moors, and it will be seen that, after having diligently practiced it for hundreds of years, it has been brought to a high degree of artistic refinement.

What is to be the future of a people who find their national pride and pleasure in such spectacles?

An American republican may hope, but can hardly predict, that their suffrages will soon administer a peaceful liberty.

SPANISH REINFORCEMENTS FOR CUBA.

OUR illustration, on the opposite page, of the landing of Spanish reinforcements for Cuba, gives a splendid view also of the harbor of Havana. This harbor has a narrow entrance for about half a mile, when it opens into a triple-headed bay, containing about nine square miles of surface, with a depth of water varying from one to six fathoms. From the entrance of the harbor up to the city the visitor is struck with the formidable defenses of the city. Besides the walls and citadels, there are six forts guarding the approach; these are El Morro, La Cabana, Numero 4, Atares, Principe, and La Punta. The harbor-front of the city is occupied by a continuous quay about 1000 yards long.

The scene shown in our illustration is one of frequent occurrence, as fresh reinforcements from Spain are continually arriving. But, while the Spanish army is thus being daily augmented, the Cuban patriots are also being steadily but effectively aided by supplies of men, arms, and ammunition from all our large cities. It is estimated that within a few weeks past as many as 5000 men have in this way been shipped to Cuba from our shores.

THE SANCTUARY.

Nor in the proud cathedral,
Where splendid thousands throng;
Not in the fashionable formal pulpit,
The loud thanksgiving song;
Not in the studied homily,
The doctrine vague and dim,
There comes that softening grace to me
That lifts my heart to Him.

I kneel in supplication,
But the thoughts will stray;
The lips repeat the words, as is meet,
But the heart is far away.
There comes no thrill of joy, blessed gush,
No tender yearning there,
Till the head bends low, and the warm tears rush,
And the spirit melts in prayer.

But alone, alone with nature—
On the everlasting hill,
That proudly arose at the world's birth-throes,
And stands unaltered still.
Down shady lanes where the wild-flowers grow,
In forest paths untrod,
In still small accents, faint and low,
I hear the voice of God.

HETTY.

BY HENRY KINGSLEY.

CHAPTER XXXII.

THE GREAT BETTY MYSTERY CLEARED UP.

Poor old Turner. He was dead enough. The life, fierce at first in its vitality, may, some said wild, had come to an almost eventless end. He had died in his chair quite quietly. A nobleman and a dissenting minister were carrying his body in a sofa, and a scared, beautiful daughter, looking on death now for the first time, was holding the candle. That was the end and finish of it all.

"Worth?" Yes. "Silence?" Beyond that of need. "Ambition?" Yes. "Money?" Enough. "Love?" Ay, and hate too. We shall never know that story. "Respect in the world?" Only one. Mother Hagbut the Dissenter are carrying him to the sofa. One of his shoes fell off and Rebecca picked it up and tried to put it on.

"It is of no use to do that," said Lord Ducretort.

No use to put on his shoe. Not one bit. There had come an end and finish. The man, as known to sight and touch, was utterly gone, with all his works and ways, bearing the consequences with him. The very tree in front of the house would last longer than he. A few days and the very image must be hidden in the earth. Shall we ever dare to appreciate the memory of death? Shall we ever dare to deduce the great future of the soul from the contempt which our good God shows toward this poor parcel of clay, a body which he has left?

He was dead. Shut your eyes for only one minute, and think of it. At one time all a man's schemes and plots, honorable and others, must come to an end! The man, as you know him, must be quickly put out of the way and hidden from eyes, exists no more. Who can wonder at Religion being the one thing which people are most furious about? That utterer of utter annihilation which produced the slightly illogical Pherdo, is the basis of all religions. There is only one tribe in the world, so far as I know, who believe in a future state, and it would be impolite to name them.

However, Turner, with all his sins and virtues, was, to his scared daughter, no more than a heap of bones and flesh. No wrong which one had ever done to the other could be righted now. He was all over. She had no means of believing that they would ever meet again. Her religion denied her the shocking and yet beautifully tender superstition of masses for his soul; she had been trained in too sharp a school to believe that Divine mercy could be bought with masses and candles. She only thought that her father had done his best, and that God would have mercy on him. Her terror, in her dumb, stunned grief, she would have asked even Hagbut about her father's future; but his popish faith had led so many evil things that she feared he might say that her father was in hell, and she also very much feared that she should believe it; and so she merely hung round his body tenderly, without one solitary tear as yet, and moaned to herself, "Dead! Alfred!"

But Morley was far away on the wild sea. There was no hope from him; and it was no use living on the floor beside the corpse, which was on the sofa, and saying at intervals, in a whisper, ghostly from want of hope, "Pa!" That was obviously no good whatever. All kinds of methods have been tried for speaking with the dead, but I have never heard of one which has succeeded.

Moaning inarticulately with all the weight of what might have been between her and that gory corpse, weighing on her more and more as the minutes went on, she lay dumb and tearless. Lord Ducretory and Mr. Hagbut, with that delicacy of manhood, which is nearly as fine as that of womanhood, left her alone, and stood about the house whispering. Carry had been hurried out of the house (being in an interesting condition), not having the least idea that her father was dead. What to do with the moaning tearless Rebecca was becoming a puzzle to Lord Ducretory. Hagbut was perfectly calm, and only said, "Wait, my lord. She will have faces round her soon which she will know. I was to preach here to-night, and I have ordered some women of my communion, who are come to hear me, to come to her."

Rebecca had nearly moaned herself to sleep on the hard floor, when she felt a kind, gentle arm round her waist, and heard a voice say, in a voice say, "My love, come with me. Get up."

"I will be very obedient," said Rebecca. "I was wrong to go to Hagbut. Now dear papa is here, I know it. Alfred Morley has forgiven me, and pa forgave me too. I will go to Wallham Green, and ask forgiveness of all. I am sure even Miss Soper would forgive me now."

"My sweet child, my own bonny girl," said old Soper; "what have to forgive? You have been a deceiving ill-tempered old maid, driven wild by girls. Come away, dear, and scold me. See here is Mrs. Russel: you will come with us, won't you?"

"Pretty sweet-heart," said Mrs. Russel; "come with us. We must put it off together yet, but we will do so for the future. Becky, my pretty love, come and lie down."

All the world was ready to extend sentimentality in the world could never have had the effect which the kindness of those two old women had on Rebecca. The tears came, and the tears came forth.

Soper and Russel behaved gloriously. Soper never yielded inch in her principles. Rebecca had once done a thing which, if done too often, would entirely ruin the ladies' character, because for which Russel had a sentimental regard, seeing that she had made a modest competence out of it. About the Ramsgate business Soper sulked for colors to the mast; but on all other points she gave way, and turned out the thoroughly good fellow which she could be. Rebecca had one stud in the house until the end, and as they never got on from one week's end to another without a squabble, they squabbled over her here.

Russel had one evening at tea that Rebecca would be all alone now. Mr. Hagbut was not like to Mr. Carry soo much of her, and she would be alone.

"A good job you," said Soper. "I hate Carry."

"She is a well-conducted girl," said Russel.

"Her sister is worth ten of her," said Soper. "Has experience! Has a character! Has!—If Rebecca was a barrack-master's daughter (you don't know what that means, I suppose?) there would never be a scandal in the mess."

Russel was so used to getting her old ears boxed by Soper that she submitted as usual, and said, "I know how it is, my dear, of course. That Morley's daughter, that Hetty, will be home soon, and she will be thrown against Rebecca. I suppose you will be jealous, dear, that you approve of that."

"Yes, I shall," said Soper. "I have retired from business, and sold connection. I'll say that. There are girls and girls, and we in our trade don't study their characters. But I'll say that," and she rubbing her nose. "I don't want to injure the woman's business who bought my school; but I will say so much as that."

"I don't be angry, my dear," said Russel.

"I shall, if I choose," Morley's daughter is the proper companion for Morley's."

"After what she has done?" cried Russel.

"What has she done?" asked Soper.

"Outraged every law of humanity," said Mrs. Russel, stoutly. "O Lord! look there."

It was only Rebecca in her dressing-gown, looking certainly very ghastly.

"My dear friends," she said, "is there any thing wrong?"

"Yes," said Russel; "Miss Soper is bucking up Hetty."

"And I don't see why I should not," said Soper; "the girl was plagued out of her life, and rebelled. Morley had not my money to give her, and she went honestly and bravely away to get money for herself and to help him. And she went as stewardess on board a Scotch steamer; and she went as governess to found an American connection; and she got money; and she got prestige for business habits; and she prospered. She is a rude girl, but she is prospered. She is a rude girl, but she is prospered. She is a rude girl, but she is necessity of baptism, the inconceivable sin of falling away from grace, and the (practically) ultra-Romish views of the communion, Rebecca loved to hear this young man preach. For there was an earnest fury about every word of his which took her heart, and his words carried with them the scent of the distant sea, the waves of which wandered over his dead wife's coffin.

So, being and active, yet perfectly peaceful, still she waited for Alfred Morley beside the tide.

MERMAIDS.

CURIOUS evidences of the existence of mermaids are to be found in ancient authors. Pliny says that "the ambassadors to Augustine from Gaul declared that sea-women were often seen in their neighborhood." Solinus and Aulus Gellius also speak of their existence. Some stories are, however, past credence. It is related in the "Histoire d'Angleterre" that, in the year 1187, a mermaid was "fished up" off the coast of Suffolk, and kept for six months. It would be a man, but wanted speech, and at length escaped into the sea." In 1403, in the great inundation which destroyed the dykes in Holland, some women at Edam, in West Friesland, saw a mermaid who had been driven by the waters into the meadows, which were overflowed. "They took it, dressed it in female attire, and taught it to spin!" It was taken to Haerlem, where it lived some years. Then we read of Ceylonese fishermen, in 1560, catching at one draught, seven mermen and mermaids, which were dissected! In 1531 a "sea maid, caught in the Baltic, was sent to Sigismund, King of Poland, with whom she lived three days, and would eat with the white cover."

In Merollo's "Voyage to Congo," in 1682, mermaids are said to be plentiful all along the River Zaire. In "Aberdeen Almanac" for 1668 it is predicted that "near the place where the famous Dee poureth his tribute to the German Ocean, on the 18, 19th, and 20th days," and other specified times, curious observers may "undoubtedly see a pretty company of mar maids," and likewise hear their melodious singing. In another part of Scotland, about the same time, Brand, in his "Description of Orkney and Shetland," tells us that two fishermen saw, up with a hook a mermaid, "having face, arm, breast, shoulders, and all as a woman, and long hanging down the neck, but the other part, from below the waist, hidden in the water." One of the fishermen wounded her with a knife, and she was seen no more! The evidence went thus: Brand was told by a lady and gentleman, who were held to be worthy of credit, to whom they belonged, who was told by the fishers! Valentyn describes a mermaid he saw in 1714, on his voyage from Batavia to Amboyna, "sitting upon the surface of the water," etc. In 1758 a mermaid is said to have been exhibited at the fair of St. Germain's. It was shown to several persons, and spoken about in a vessel of water. It was fed with bread and fish. It was a female, with negro features.

In 1775 appeared a very circumstantial account of a mermaid which was captured in the Grecian Archipelago in the preceding year, and exhibited in London. The account is ludicrously minute, and it ends with: "It is said to have an enchanting voice, which it never exerts except before a storm." This imposture was cruelly made up out of the skin of the angle-shark. In Mr. Morgan's "Year in Milford Haven in the year 1758" appears an equally circumstantial account of a mermaid, said to have been seen by one Henry Reynolds, a farmer, of Rev-y-holi, in the parish of Castlemartin, in 1782. It resembled a youth of sixteen or eighteen years of age, with a very white skin: was bathing. The writer believes it very roundabout, so that there were abundant means for converting some peculiar kind of distinto a mermaid, without imputing intentional dishonesty to any one. "Something akin to this kind of evidence is observable in the account of a mermaid seen in Caithness in 1809, which attracted much attention in England as well as in Scotland, and excited the Philosophical Society of Glasgow to investigate the matter. The editor of a newspaper, who inserted the statement, had been told by a gentleman, who had been shown a letter by Sir John Sinclair, who had obtained it from Mr. Innes, to whom it had been written by Mr. Traill, who had had the account from the persons (two servant girls and a boy) who had seen the strange animal in the water."

Then we come to a so-called mermaid, shown in the year 1794 at No. 7 Broad Court, Bow Street, Covent Garden, said to have been taken in the North Seas by Captain Foster. This is the usual description.

Much evidence comes from Scotland. Thus, in the year 1808, a schoolmaster of Thurso affirmed that he had seen a mermaid, apparently in the act of combing her hair with her fingers! Twelve years afterward several persons declared near the same place a like appearance. Dr. Chisholm, in his "Essay on Malignant Fever in the West Indies," in 1801, relates that, in the year 1797, happening to be at Governor Van Batteneg's plantation, in Berbice, "the account was turned on a singular animal which had been repeatedly seen in Berbice River, and some smaller rivers. Such animal is the famous mermaid, hitherto considered as a mere creature of the imagination. It is called by the Indians seekmamma—or mother of waters. The description given of it by the Governor is as follows:

"The upper portion resembles the human figure, the head smaller in proportion, sometimes bare, but oftener covered with a copious quantity of long black hair. The shoulders are broad, and the breasts large and well formed. The lower portion resembles the tail of a fish, is of great dimensions, the tail forked, and not unlike that of the dolphin, as it is usually represented. The color of the skin is either black or tawny. The animal is held in veneration by the Indians, who imagine that killing it would be attended with calamitous consequences. It is from this circumstance that none of these animals have been shot, and consequently examined but at a distance. They have been generally observed in a sitting posture in the water, none of the lower extremity being seen until they are disturbed, when, by plunging, the tail agitates the water to a considerable distance round. They have been always seen employed in smoothing their hair, and have then been frequently observed in the act of women bathing. In 1811 a young man named John M'Isaac, of Corphine, in Kintyre, in Scotland, made oath, on examination before a magistrate, that he saw, on the 13th of October in the above year, on a rock on the sea-coast, an animal which generally corresponded with the idea of a sea-maid—the upper half human shape, the other bristled or reddish grey, apparently covered with scales; the extremity of the tail resembled two head covered with long hair, at times put back on both sides of the head." This statement was attested by the minister of Campbell-town and the Chamberlain of Mull.

In August, 1811, Mr. Tompin, of Exmouth, in a sailing excursion, and when about a mile southeast of Exmouth Bar, heard a sound like that of the Æolian harp, and saw, about one hundred yards' distance, a creature, which was regarded as a mermaid. The head, from the crown of the head to the throat, was of the usual proportion to resemble that of the seal, though with more agreeable features. The presumed hair, the throat, and the head, with the countenance, covered by a membrane, are then described, and the tail with polished scales. The entire length of the animal was from six to seven feet. In 1813 a creature approached the coast of Ireland. It was about the size of a child ten years of age, with a human head, long hair, and dark eyes. It was shot at, when it plunged into the sea with a loud scream.

In reviewing these stories of mermaids it may be remarked that there is always a fish in each tale—either a living fish or a peculiar kind, which is fanciful appropriated to the mermaid, sometimes in the upper part to a human being, or a fish which becomes marvelous in the progress of its description from ancient to modern. It was commonly thought the seals may often have been mistaken for mermaids. But of all the animals of the whale tribe the whale approaches the nearest in form to man is, undoubtedly, the dugong, which, when its head and breast are raised above the water, and its pectoral fins, resembling hands, are visible, might easily be taken by superstitious seamen for a semi-human creature. Steller's account of the reception a remarkable instance occurred in 1826. The skeleton of a mermaid, as it was called, was brought to the museum of Buffalo, and was shot in the vicinity of the Island of Monbass. This was submitted to the members of the Philosophical Society, when it proved to be the skeleton of a dugong. To those who came to the examination with preconceived notions of a fabulous mermaid it presented, as it lay in the museum, a very peculiar appearance. It was about six feet long; the lower portion, with its broad tail-like extremity, suggested the idea of a fish; while the upper termination, while the fore-legs resembled to the unskilful eye a resemblance to the bones of a small female arm, with the rudiments of a hand in the form, which could never have borne the lineaments of the human face divine.

The "Cape Ann Advertiser" of August 6 has already been incidentally mentioned as associations in these mermaid stories; and these, with the origin of the creation of the mermaid, Hind has ingeniously attempts to explain: "The resemblance of the seal, or sea-calf, to the calf consists only in the general form, and in some of the species not dissimilar to that of a man. But the claws of the seal, as well as the hand, are like a lady's back-hand exactly, therefore, altogether supposing the resemblence of sea-water streaming down its polished neck, as the seal rises from the subsiste for a looking-glass, we arrive at once at the fabulous history of the marine animal in the water." Then we have a so-called mermaid, which a number of Glasgow to investigate the matter. The editor of a newspaper, who inserted the statement, had been told by a gentleman, who had been shown a letter by Sir John Sinclair, who had obtained it from Mr. Innes, to whom it had been written by Mr. Traill, who had had the account from the persons (two servant girls and a boy) who had seen the strange animal in the water."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

As multitudes of families in the city have changed their residence within a couple of weeks many housekeepers may have been driven to look around for more convenient place to purchase meats, vegetables, and groceries. The prudent housewife will not decide to patronize a market, especially if it be a small, private one, without making careful investigations, and inquiries also, if she be not well skilled herself in the selections of meats. In the city people are in constant danger of buying unwholesome food. Dealers are too often unscrupulous, and customers are remiss alone, and the cheapness of an article is often its chief recommendation to people of limited means.

In New York city the regulations for preventing the sale of unwholesome provisions are tolerably stringent; yet not enough so to exclude them from numerous market-places. Purchasers must themselves learn to know what is good and what is bad. A recent number of the British Medical Journal mentions some characteristics of good meat which may aid those who are searching for their own tables. "Good, wholesome meat has a marbled appearance—beef especially—from the intermixture of little veins of fat among the muscles. It should be firm and elastic to the touch, and should scarcely moisten the fingers when pressed with the hand, with the least trace of acid or odor—diseased meat has a disagreeable odor, a pale, flabby look, and is often of a dropsical deep purple that indicates that the animal has died with the blood in it, or has suffered from fever. Good meat would not lose more than bad, and after standing a day or two is much dearer on the surface.

A great deal of meat is sold in London under "colonial," is smuggled into our city markets, and is liable to produce very serious disturbances of digestion. In general, no unwholesome meat is as nutritious as that from a fully developed animal. Veal less than four months old is generally poor, and unfit for human food; yet a great quantity is sent to market only four or five days old—and in spite of laws and detectives is sold. It is cheap, by the way price, and the butchers have various artificial methods of making the flesh look attractive. Inferior meat is also frequently sold, and is often the direct and immediate cause of disease.

In the case of the people against William H. Munster, the Judge said that, after careful attention to the case, he had come to the conclusion that the prisoner should be discharged, because he might himself believe that trick and deception had been practiced by the printers, and that, as to the capacity of prisoner, he was compelled to decide that he should not be justified in sending the defense to the Grand Jury, as in his opinion the prosecution had failed to prove the case.

As an exhange gently hints that chivalric deeds and high-class articles of literary beauty promoted if some papers in different parts of the country would insert some such notice:

"Yesterday afternoon a gentleman occupying a seat in a State Street horse-car, rose promptly upon the entrance of a lady, politely proffered his services, and tendered her his place. She at first declined, but at last accepted it. The act will be a life-long remembrance to her." "This afternoon Mr. A. B. Robinson's residence, No. 1 Bleecker Street, between 1st No.—Street, while crossing Broadway, stepped from the walk into the mud, in order to reverently let the beautiful Miss H., who rewarded him with a smile." "At the residence of Mr. Peter Schuyler, No. C., one of the most admired of our Chicago belles, gave up her seat in a crowded car to a small child. Mr. C. wore, at the time, a garnet silk. Her hair was auburn." "Yesterday afternoon, Master J. Brown Babcock."

Courtesy in public places is certainly fearfully on the decline, and any legitimate means for reviving it would be welcomed by the majority.

The proposal to establish a fortnightly boat-race between the crews of Harvard and Oxford will take place on the Thames course, England, in the last week of August. The Harvard men have a great deal of enthusiasm in going some three thousand miles to row on the Thames, and Mr. Lowell has remarked in reference to the contest: "The multitude will feel that the Americans have deserved success, even if they do not win it, and if they win, no Englishman will grudge them the banner they have come so far to pluck."

The famous accident is related of Rosenmüller. In 1814 he was visited by a delegation from his native city, Saxe-Meiningen, who had resolved to erect a bronze statue of him at no public place before the City Hall, so that, as the delegation said, the country people, who came to market at his native city, might could see their renowned countryman. "And how much will it cost?" inquired Rosenmüller. "Why the City Council has thus far set apart twelve thousand livres," was the answer. "Well, listen to me, dear Sirs; I will make you a proposition. Give me half of this sum, and I will oblige myself to stand twice a week in the appointed place, so that my countrymen can enjoy my presence, and look at the 'great man' to their hearts' content."

Reports from England indicate that Mr. Charles Dickens has quite overtasked himself, in spite of his usually robust health. Recently he was presented from fulfilling an engagement to read in London by sudden illness. Persons who went twenty or thirty miles to hear him were sorely disappointed, but were obliged to content themselves with their money, all tickets being redeemed at the door. Mr. Dickens's physician positively forbids more rest for his patient, but he has still many engagements to fulfill, and every reading is the occasion of a large amount of exhausting pain.

United States soldiers in Alaska seem to be any thing but a credit to our country. The San Francisco Chronicle makes some statements, based, it says, on reliable information, showing that many of the American officers have been guilty of shameful conduct. Gambling and drinking to excess are common occurrences; and women have been subjected to outrageous insults. The apology given for various atrocities is that the military gentlemen were "on a spree, and did not know what they were about."

"Can a spirit be photographed?" still continues to be an exciting question to certain portions of the community. A Bostonian makes public the "fact" that in 1861 he sat for his picture in the rooms of a photographer living in the Connecticut Valley. During the process the artist became strangely agitated, and when the plate was developed a bright but vapory female form appeared standing at the side of the sitter. The photographer declared he did not know how the form got on the plate, he could only say that he saw it with a man, that he had occasionally taken similar pictures, but through no agency of his, and that he did not want to have such a thing to do with spirits.

Mr. Mumler made a statement in court last week to the effect that when an engraver in Boston, in lieu, he said sometimes, to try experiments in a large portable gallery. One Sunday, when entirely alone in the gallery, he attempted to obtain a photograph of himself and then first discovered while developing it a second form on the plate. Subsequent attempts produced remarkable results, and Mumler became determined to leave his own business, and devote himself to photography.

In 1870 a Workmen's International Exhibition will be held in London. Workmen are invited to exhibit specimens of that particular branch in which they are engaged, either the whole, or a separate part of any work. All articles exhibited are to have the name of the workmen attached. Employers may also exhibit for themselves provided the names of the workmen as well as their own are displayed. The Committee desire to show the different processes of manufacture, as that different methods may be compared, and that a friendly competition may be incited, and fresh ones. Alone made the movement in the various branches of industry. The exhibition will be in the great Agricultural Hall, which is capable of holding about thirty thousand persons.

It is said by a recent traveler in Florida, that while the climate of the Land State is healthful to persons with pulmonary complaints, inland, and especially on the rivers, it is regarded as unhealthy. He reports that most of the settlers on the St. Johns River are very sick of their experiments, and anxious to return. Persons with means will purchase the improved farms or orange plantations, can doubtless do well in Florida, but not small families, who must work the soil themselves. The oranges are peaceful, and anxious for Northern emigration.

We see it stated that "Timothy Titcomb" (Dr. J. G. Holland) has been elected Professor of Belles-lettres in the Sunday School of the American Chapel in Paris.

A curious invention has been perfected by the engineer of Yale College, Mississippi, whereby a rifle ou being attached to a piano is said to print music as fast as it is played.

It is greatly to the credit of the Jews that their arrangements for taking care of their poor are so thoroughly that a needy beggar is seldom or never seen. Their system of charitable relief is founded on the principle of placing the needy in a situation to earn their own living, if they are physically able to do so. Otherwise they are pensioned, not put into a hospital, or otherwise kept in idleness at the public expense. A new Heb-ew hospital is soon to be erected on Lexington Avenue, between Sixty-sixth and Sixty-seventh streets. It is another remarkable fact that the Mount Sinai Hospital, which has been organized seventeen years, has cared for persons of all creeds, and without distinction of color.

We see it stated that a lady of Des Moines, Iowa, is going to have the finest flower' ilen and fairs a young lady at the Portfield Mill, near Tidloute, Pennsylvania, has for the last two months packed eight thousand shingles a day—Sundays excepted—and thinks that she promises hereafter to pack ten thousand a day!

A new way to overcome an old difficulty was resorted to by a young lady whose betrothed was persuaded by his friends not to marry because she was penniless. He had been for years in search of promise, and obtained $25,000 damages. He then coolness his sin ed about his pocket-book on the floor, when his friends' objections were removed by the received cash, and now owns. She took him, or rather he took her—money!

The Princess Mathilde, Napoleon's queenly-looking cousin, was once wicked to make his wife. has in her boudoir an old riding-whip which she once wrested from the hands of the brutal Russian, Prince Demidoff, who struck her with it after he had struck his wife in the f e. On that occasion the resolute young lady stood to her own defense, and, with the riding-whip, and after taking the riding-whip from his hand, struck him across his face with it.

Somebody's fortune has run through a paper-mill! Not long ago a workman in a paper manufactory in Dayton, Ohio, caught sight of some bills in the waste, looking green, which had been clipped in pieces by the picker. They proved to be scraps of greenbacks. The man picked up a handful and distributed them to his friends. The denominations were large, and it was estimated that no less than $5,000 were "ground up."

The recent Spanish decree impounded in the treasury the canons of the recent railroad slaughter on the Long Island Railroad. The officers of the Long Island Railroad Company are responsible for the accident, by neglecting their duty in keeping their tracks in good repair.

Among the numerous culinary couplets floating through the public press, some few are really worth thinking about. Here is one:

Broil lightly your beefsteak—to fry it
Argues contempt of Christian diet.

To roast potatoes—allow me to spoil 'em—
Just split 'em down the back a d broil 'em.

Egg sauce—few make it right, alas!—
A good yolk mixed with bosh.

Nice oyster sauce gives zest to cod—
A fish, when fresh, to feast a god.

In dressing salad, mind this I w—
With two hard yolks use one hat's raw.

Not very long ago, in the above-named city, a rich old bachelor, a stately lady of New York, returning to some music and regaling herself with lozenges. Upon the door stopping at the house—a very little man who had a pretty good opinion of himself—and he had marked the distinguished-looking lady as his particular prototype, but she had genteelly repelled him. He came into the room as she sat there and approached her. As he did so, one of her lozenges dropped and rolled along the carpet. Jones saw it, and, after a brief rest, captured it. He brought it to the lady and handed it to her. She didn't look at him, but with a patronizing gesture of her head waived him off with, "Keep it, dear, keep it." He did not feel much larger than ordinary men for some time after that.

THE FLOATING LIGHT-HOUSE.

THE Floating Light-house, of which we give an illustration on this page, was erected at the entrance of the port of Liverpool, over some rocks, where, owing to the action of the currents, it was found impossible to erect a light-house like those ordinarily in use. The bulb below water is anchored, as is shown in the cut; the extent of the circular plate near the surface of the water securing the stability of the entire structure. The construction of the edifice, both as regards material and shape, is suited to the novel purpose to be attained. Much of romance has been associated with light-house keepers; but surely no situation could possibly be more romantic than that of the old fellow shown in our picture, looking out through his spy-glass upon the desert waste of waters from his floating but steadfast habitation.

TOMB OF NAPOLEON I. AT ST. HELENA.

IN a late Number of our paper (for MAY 1, 1869) we gave a very striking illustration of the island of St. Helena, the scene of NAPOLEON I.'s exile. We give this week two additional views; one representing NAPOLEON'S residence at Longwood, and the other his tomb. If our readers will look back to the article accompanying our previous illustration, they will find a detailed description of Longwood and also of NAPOLEON'S tomb.

RAILROAD DISASTER IN MAINE.

WE illustrate on page 333 the recent disaster which happened on the Portland and Oxford Central Railroad, on the bridge at Buckfield, Maine, early in the evening of April 29, involving considerable loss of property, but fortunately no loss of life or serious personal injury.

The engine of the down train from Hartford to Buckfield had just run on to the first span of the bridge at Buckfield village, which crosses the mill-pond just above the dam, when the whole span—about sixty feet in length—gave way, dropping the engine, tender, and first car, loaded with wood, ten or twelve feet into the water below. The conductor, Mr. ED. S. BURROUGHS; the engineer, Mr. O. P. TUCKER; and a young Mr. L. GOETHER, who happened to be supplying the place of the regular fireman, were in the cab of the engine, and found themselves dropped, without a moment's warning, under water dense with smoke, steam, and ashes.

Mr. BURROUGHS says that he was at first conscious that he was under water in the cab, and that the foot of another person was on his neck. He then made a tremendous effort, disentangled himself from the other man, crawled through the cab-window, and got his head above water. He came out on the lower side next to the dam, over which the water was pouring with tremendous force, being very high at the time. At first he thought to cling to the dam, but the power of the water quickly carried him over, followed by fragments of broken timber and sticks of cord-wood. He fell with the water several feet down among the rocks, and was carried down the stream several rods, till a Mr. BESSEE reached him a pole by wading out, and drew him ashore completely prostrated with knocking about in the water, and somewhat bruised, though not so much so but that he came down with his train the next day as mail.

The fireman and engineer crawled out of the cab on the upper side, and clambered up over the wreck to terra firma, not much hurt.

The excitement was very great in the village, and soon the scene of the wreck was lined with people.

Fortunately no other persons were on the train at the time of the accident.

No blame whatever can be laid to the conductor or engineer, as the engine was driven on to the bridge with the greatest caution. The bridge was thought to be entirely safe, having been overhauled this spring and put in good repair. It was built upon stone piers on the X-work plan, and considered sufficiently strong.

SERIOUS CASUALTY AT SYRACUSE, NEW YORK.

IN connection with the railroad disaster at Buckfield, Maine, we give also, on the same page, an illustration of a somewhat similar casualty that happened at Syracuse, New York, on the evening of April 30.

The steam fire-engine "Central City, No. 1," was being drawn to a fire in the Third Ward. The engine had landed on Salina Street bridge, over the Erie Canal; and as it passed the first needle-beam, 8 feet from the abutment, the flooring gave way, letting the steamer down to the bed of the canal, a distance of 20 feet. The horses were on the next section, but as the heavy rear end of the machine went down, the horses were drawn with it, reversing their direction, and both striking their heads against the stone abutment had their necks broken, killing them almost instantly.

THOMAS ABELER, the driver, as he went down, was thrown from the seat, and landed several feet from the engine, but fortunately escaped without broken bones, though receiving serious injury to his left leg.

EDWARD HUDSON, engineer, was riding on the rear of the steamer as usual, and when it began to go he sprang to save himself, catching hold of the iron rods of the upper frame-work, and succeeded in scrambling up. But in doing so struck his stomach and abdomen forcibly against the jutting timbers, producing a very serious breach.

GEORGE HENDRICKS, a brakeman on the railroad, somehow had taken the near horse by the bit in going up the incline, and was still holding on when the fall occurred, and he was jerked down with the rest. He landed some distance from the wreck, but had his left arm broken just above the wrist.

Several persons were on the ends of the bridge at the time, and very soon a number were in the bed of the canal (there being no water in), to ascertain the situation and aid the unfortunate. Lanterns were obtained, and ARELER and HENDRICKS taken out, and their injuries attended to. The engine lies in the canal bed, a complete wreck. It weighed about four tons, and cost the city $3000.

The bridge has been in an unsafe condition a long time. A year ago the north end of it gave way when a safe was being drawn over it. That part of it was then repaired, but the balance of it left without overhauling. The needle-beam that gave way now was rotten half-way through.

These two accidents, both occurring in the same week, clearly urge the importance of strong bridges, and also the necessity of strict attention to their condition and of prompt repairs.

THE NEW "CHICAGO TRIBUNE" BUILDING.

NEWSPAPER buildings are becoming a distinctive feature in the architecture of the country. The illustration presented herewith represents the new building of the Chicago Tribune as it appeared on the night of Tuesday, May 10, when illuminated in honor of the completion of the Pacific Railway. The location of this edifice is at the southeast corner of Dearborn and Madison streets. Its area on the ground is 72 by 121 feet, and its height 70 feet. It is constructed of Athens (Illinois) marble, and is fire-proof in every part. The ceilings, stairways, and cornice are of iron, and the partition walls of brick. The floors are laid in cement, and the entire building is heated with BAKER, SMITH, & CO.'s hot-water apparatus. The ventilation of the building was planned by Professor LEEDS, and is believed to answer all the requirements of modern hygienic science. The wood-work is butternut and black walnut, finely polished. The counting-room, which occupies the ground-floor corner, is not excelled in beauty or convenience by any office in the country. The editorial rooms (nine in number) are on the fourth floor. The press-room contains two of HOE's eight-cylinder printing-machines. The composing-room is 60 feet long, 50 feet wide, and 25 feet high, lighted on two sides and also at the top. Besides the room occupied by the Tribune Company for their own purposes there are between thirty and forty stores, offices, and basements rented to outsiders. The time occupied in the construction of the building was one year. Its cost, exclusive of machinery, was $200,000. Altogether it is one of the most complete and durable printing establishments in the world.

THE NATIONAL PEACE JUBILEE BUILDING, BOSTON.

ON illustration of this building on page 328 shows its present condition. The musical festival for which it is being constructed will be held in Boston next June, beginning on the 15th, and lasting during five days. The Coliseum, as this building is called, has been roofed, and the labor of finishing and decorating the interior has been commenced. Over twenty-seven thousand dollars have been subscribed in advance for tickets of admission. Arrangements have been made for the comfortable shelter of the thousands of strangers who are expected to visit Boston during the Jubilee week.

Messrs. E. & G. G. HOOK, organ builders, of Boston, have contracted to furnish a large and powerful organ for the Coliseum, to be used at the National Peace Jubilee. It is intended that the instrument shall be one of such strength and power as shall sustain the vast chorus and orchestra, and fill the building with sound. The great chorus, the largest the world has ever seen, is now full, and the orchestral ranks are rapidly filling up. The superintendent of the chorus, Mr. P. TOURJEE, has found it necessary to issue a circular stating that no more choral organizations can be accepted, and that societies already accepted must make no more additions to their numbers. OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, it is said, is to write a hymn to be sung by the grand chorus.

PACIFIC RAILWAY CELEBRATION AT CHICAGO—ILLUMINATION OF THE NEW "CHICAGO TRIBUNE" BUILDING, MAY 10, 1869.

THE ESCAPE OF A NUN.

SOME people may be under the impression that nuns are free to leave their convents if they choose. Let the following fact speak for itself. Early one morning in December, the little portern gate of the convent was slowly and cautiously opened, and a lady, closely muffled in long cloak and thick veil, issued from it. It was too dark for her to see to any distance, but after an anxious, searching glance on every side, she hastened along a narrow lane that wound past the convent wall into the village, and made her way to the place where a post car was just about starting for a town some thirty miles off. In a very excited manner she made arrangements for taking her seat upon it; and the members of the little crowd which had collected to see the car start, indulged in many surmises as to who she might be—the darkness and her close wrappings preventing their distinguishing her features. At last, to her evident relief, the car began to move, and was soon out of sight of the group who watched it. About two hours afterward, however, a rumor ran through the village that a nun had escaped from the convent, and in answer to the impatient inquiries of those seeking her, it was speedily discovered that a veiled lady had left the place on the post car. As soon as this fact was established, two young priests mounted their horses, and set off in hot pursuit. The road was very hilly, and as they spurred their horses with a will, up hill and down another, they scanned their eyes to catch a view of the post car on which the poor fugitive was escaping from her prison-house, but they saw it not.

The car had got a good two hours' start of them; and when they arrived at its destination, they found in their chagrin that the object and captive had taken another conveyance, and was already far on her way to a small town some twenty miles further from the convent. As soon as they could procure fresh horses (for those they had ridden were staggering from fatigue) the two priests again set forward, and in the chase; but the short December day closed in around them, and still no traces of the runaway could be found. Late in the evening they reached the town to which she had gone, and on inquiry found that she had certainly stopped there, for the car on which she had traveled was safe in the inn yard, and she had not taken any other conveyance. She was not there, however, in person; her host had applied for a room in any of the lodging-houses in the neighborhood. It was late to prosecute the search that night; so, as he fled for the moment, the priests sat down to their suppers in a very bad humor, discussing many plans of operation for the coming day, and according vows of punishments to come for the offender when she should be once more in safe keeping.

Early the next morning a thorough investigation of the town, which was quite under priestly control, was commenced. Not a house, not a garret to cellar, was left unsearched, but without avail. The fugitive had evidently managed to get away. But how? That was the question. At last an old woman was found who said she had seen a lady standing along in the shadow of the house late the night before, and that she had taken her way toward the open country. It was plain that the hunted creature had sought to throw her pursuers off the scent by proceeding on foot and alone through the wild passes of the mountains. Men with a spirit of mercenary human beings with even the smallest touch of humanity in their hearts—Christians with but the faintest glow of Christianity within them—would have felt an overwhelming pity for the poor, frail woman with such a courageous spirit; who having been, without a crime, held in bondage worse than that of the Israelites, was flying from the scene of her imprisonment—from grated windows and barred doors—through the darkness and wildness of a December night, alone and unprotected, along rugged roads and mountain gloom, from the vile exercise of power given by those who dogged her terrified footsteps. No; like blood-hounds thirsting for their prey, they hastened on the track with a savage and unrelenting ferocity joy that boded ill for the poor victim should she fall into their hands. For several days the most effective searched among the retired glens of the highest mountains, climbed every rock, pressed into every crevice that could afford shelter to even the smallest animal, but still the pursuit was unrewarded. Day by day, as no discoveries succeeded disappointment, the rage of the pursuers became fiercer, and their thirst to secure the fugitive more strong and burning. Every place that could afford her refuge had already been examined, and as they passed along, weary and infuriated at their want of success, the curses on the unconscious nun rolled from beneath their feet into the rocky hollows with a mocking sound, and the bare, bleak tops of the mountains seemed to look down on them in scorn; but suddenly turning an acute angle on the crest of one of the range, a narrow gorge came into view, and in its most secluded depths a miserable hovel appeared. A sudden inspiration had the priests that at last their quarry had been struck, and stealing like cats' footfalls on their prey, they approached the cottage from different sides. There was but one opening—the door; and when they came within reach of it, they strung together through it into the only room the wretched abode contained; and there, on a truss of straw, in a state of utter exhaustion, lay the poor hunted creature whose bodily pains and weariness had left her at last, worn out mind and body, completely at the mercy of those who had so relentlessly hunted her down.

Without a moment's delay the wretched woman was seized upon, and conveyed by the priests, as best they could, to the nearest town. She was now completely helpless in their hands—all her energy gone, and all her powers of mind and body prostrated utterly, so that without any difficulty she was placed in a post-chaise, and taken, not to the convent from which she had escaped, but to another, famed for the strictness of its discipline, and there she still remains, if death has not set her free. Who shall say what agonies of mind and body have been inflicted upon her? No human tongue will tell, nor pen will write, what her tortures have been, for the high walls and barred gates of the prison-house keep those secrets well; but the all-seeing eye of the great Being has seen it all, and His ear has heard the utterances of the cry, "Vengeance is mine; I will repay," saith the Lord. But God will not hold those guiltless who, having the power to prevent such cruel wrong, refuse even to go on unchecked, and who even uphold a Church whose tyranny has been the nightmare of ages.

CELEBRATED ROADS.

THAT over the Simplon was projected by Napoleon, and made at the joint expense of France and Italy. It was completed in 1805—being thirty-six miles long, about twenty-five feet broad, and passes over two central and sixty-four bridges, through six short tunnels of solid rock—one, however, being thirteen hundred feet in length, by twelve in width. It was the most stupendous enterprise ever undertaken by man.

Another road, marvelous in all respects, passes from Milan to Naples, lying between Switzerland and Italy. It passes between two of the highest points of the mountain—the road at that point being one hundred and fifty above the level of the sea. The route is very circuitous, and passes a celebrated monastery, distinguished for the humanity of the monks and the sagacity and monstrous size of a breed of dogs kept there for the assistance of travelers. Napoleon crossed over with an army in 1800.

Over Mount St. Gothard is another wonderful road, only twelve feet wide, paved with granite. The Devil's Bridge, on this road, spans with a single arch (having peaks of rocks for abutments) an awful abyss, which it must have required the highest order of engineering genius to have spanned. All three are among the wonders of the world.

Ancient Rome at one epoch in her history had twenty-nine costly military roads—many of them bordered on either side by splendid tombs and palatial residences. Every twelve miles buildings were erected where relays of horses were always in readiness, and also carriages and carriages and beasts of burden for the conveyance of baggage and goods. At intervals of thirty miles there were stationed fifty soldiers. Such was the admirable finish of those roads, running generally directly from one city to another, that they have actually endured for over two thousand years in some places, and excite admiration still on account of their excellent construction.

The Hoosic Tunnel in Western Massachusetts, when completed, will far excel any road in ancient or modern times. It is destined to be a wonder of wonders.

THE MOON'S INFLUENCE.

WHATEVER be the influence exercised upon the earth by the varying positions of the planets, it is unquestionable that the most powerful effect is produced upon our orb by the changes in the position of our satellite the moon. That tiny orb, a mere speck compared with the larger planets, nevertheless by its nearness exerts an influence upon earth far greater than that produced by all the planets collectively. At the times it was never doubted that the moon greatly affected the superficial condition of our planet—not only as regards the weather, but also by more subtle forms of action. The words "lunatic" and "moon struck" still exist to show this old belief—indicating, as they do, a conviction that the moon's action upon the cerebral or nervous organs of man. And in many of the old, indeed still prevalent, superstitions, the belief of the influence of the moon upon the atmospheric condition of our planet is abundantly shown. In recent times, however, this belief has received a cold belief; and some years ago it was authoritatively declared, as the verdict of Science, that the moon had no effect upon the weather at all. Now, even judging à priori, yet upon purely scientific grounds, this verdict of the utmost might have called forth incredulous shrieks. Since the moon powerfully affects the ocean, the vast expanse of water which covers the larger part of earth's surface, producing the striking phenomenon of the tides—can it be doubted that lunar action on the waters of the air, the much greater extent, affect the still more mobile ocean of air (the atmosphere) which covers the whole surface of our globe? Such a theory would produce tides and currents in the atmosphere, must it not to an important degree affect the weather, which is so largely dependent upon the currents, movements, and disturbances in the atmosphere?

In truth, although the recent dictum of Science ignoring the moon's action upon the weather, moon has any influence upon the weather, has not yet been formally revoked, it is easy to see that science begins to falter in their doctrine. And well they may. A whole host of facts are arrayed against them. Professor Palmieri, who has so closely studied the varying phenomena of Vesuvius, declares that there is a perceptible relation between the phases of the moon and the developments of volcanic action. Any one, too, who has lived in the south, or even sailed on the Mediterranean, may have noticed how carefully sleepers in the open air guard their head and face against the rays of the moon; he may even have seen instances of serious inconvenience from the action of the ophthalmia and other ills) which attend the neglect of such precautions. In India it is well known that meat exposed to the moonrays immediately putrefies. Some of these facts indicate a lunar action more subtle than Science can as yet account for. But the moon's influence on the weather is perfectly intelligible—on the grounds, if no other, that it produces tides and currents in the atmosphere just as it does in the less mobile ocean.

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

I HAVE used my WHEELER & WILSON Sewing Machine over ten years without repairs, and without breaking a needle, although I commenced the use of it without any instruction. Have used it constantly for family sewing; have quilted whole quilts of the largest size, and it is still in complete order. Runs like a top, and bids fair to be willed to those who come after me, with better powers of production than an unbroken prairie farm. MRS. H. E. G. AREY.

Headache Cured.

This should be good news for the gentler sex, and the more so as it is absolutely true. The sick and nervous headaches, from which many of them suffer so terribly, are not merely relieved, but permanently banished by its use. Sent to ALTHOUSE'S IRON AND SULPHUR POWDERS. The proper method is to dissolve a powder in three tablespoonfuls of pure soft water and take a tea-spoonful half-hourly until the nausea ceases which will always be before the whole is consumed. Only one or two doses will be sufficient. The patient is usually pale, but after the doses have been swallowed and a few minutes the complaint will be entirely cured.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00 without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE to Canada a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the Magazine, 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the TIME to which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription has expired. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY commence with the year. When no time is specified it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be replaced, Uncurrent Money or the sender.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

A HOUSEHOLD ELIXIR

ADAPTED TO ALL CLIMATES,

It would be a happy thing for the world if all the excitants at present used in the practice of medicine could be swept out of existence, and substituted in their place. There is a probability, too, that this desirable substitution may one day be accomplished. Certain it is that the GREAT VEGETABLE TONIC is gradually displacing them, and that the confidence of the people in its sanitary and saving properties increases with every passing year. "Figures that can not lie" show this to be the fact. No medicinal preparation enjoys the like popularity among all classes and conditions, in every section of the country. As an appetizer, a general invigorant, a remedy for indigestion, a tonic for intermittent and remittent fevers, a gentle cathartic, a specific for flatulency and sour stomach, a gentle diuretic, a nervine, a blood depurant, a specific for sick headache, a mild anodyne, and, above all, as a PROTECTION AGAINST EPIDEMICS, it is unquestionably the STANDARD MEDICINE of the whole United States. In the towns and cities it is literally a HOUSEHOLD STAPLE. Mothers believe in it. They find it a "present help in time of trouble"—a safe and pleasant remedy for the various ailments to which their sex is exclusively subject. Men believe in it, because it refreshes and invigorates the body and the mind, and tones both without exciting either.

This is acknowledged to be the best saw and in more general use than any other in the United States. For Sale by all first-class Hardware Dealers. Made by the LIVINGSTON MANUFACTURING CO., 59 BEEKMAN ST., N. Y.

The Celebrated Imitation Gold $15. HUNTING WATCHES. $20.

THE COLLINS ORoIDE WATCH FACTORY.

CASES OF THE COLLINS METAL (IMPROVED ORoIDE).

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Our superior Oroide Watches having recently been imitated, and worthless Watches sold in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities, stpplied—executed as our Watches, we hereby caution the public against them, and give notice that we are in no way responsible for these bogus concerns, and beg those purchasing elsewhere to recall from us can secure a genuine Watch of our manufacture. We have recently greatly improved our Oroide in appearance and durability; and as no protection can be given imitations hereafter, we have decided to and we give notice that any one making use of this name will be prosecuted to the extent of the law.

"TO CLOSE OUT"

This metal has all the brilliancy and durability of Gold; can not be distinguished from it by the best judges; retains its color till worn out, and is equal to gold excepting in intrinsic value. All our Gentlemen's Watches are Full-Jeweled Patent Levers; those for Ladies an improved Escapement, better than a Lever for a small Watche, all in Hunting Cases, and fully guaranteed by special certificate. The $15 Watches are equal in accuracy, style of finish, general appearance, and for time, to a Gold one costing $150. Those for $20 are of extra fine finish, and are fully equal to a Gold Watch costing $200. Chains of every style, from $2 to $8.

JEWELRY.—We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Collins Metal—Pins, Earring, Sleeve-Buttons, Lockets, Studs, Finger-Rings, Bracelets, Pencils, Charms, Medals, Masonic Pins, &c., all of the latest and most elegant styles, and fully equal to gold in appearance and wear.

TO CLUBS.—Where Six Watches are ordered at one time, we will send one extra Watch free of charge.

We positively employ no agents (who would require a commission), so we can not possibly manufacture the Watches for less than our present prices. Our regular customers will confer a favor by bearing of our lowest prices. Parties in New York or elsewhere representing themselves as our agents are swindlers. The genuine Collins Watches can only be had at our office in New York City. Customers are requested not to send money in letters, as we will send goods to any part of the United States to be paid for when taken from the express office. Customers will please add all express charges to their orders. In ordering, write plainly the name, town, county, and state. Customers in the city will remember that our only Office is

Nos. 37 and 39 Nassau Street, Opposite the Post-Office (Up Stairs), New York.

DR. WM. SMITH'S BIBLE HISTORIES.

The Student's Old Testament History.

THE OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY. From the Creation to the Return of the Jews from Captivity. Edited by WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D. With Maps and Woodcuts. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

This is an abridgment of the author's larger history which will no doubt obtain a wider circulation than the similar volumes on the History of Greece or Rome, as the subject-matter is of wider interest; at the same time, it will be more generally studied. We are glad to say that it will endure this scrutiny, and will satisfy the more it is examined. It is one of the most eminently evangelical.—Churchman, London.

ADDRESS TO SMOKERS.

In reply to the many inquiries made daily in regard to Meerschaum Pipes, we wish to state that we recommend, especially for home and office use, the Joint Hungarian and Egg Bowls with Welchsel Stems. They hold the most tobacco, and are the most durable and practical pipes, being the nearest to clean. The Hamburg Bowls, having the largest surface to show color. For travelling and street smoking, we recommend the London Straight and London Bent.

Being represented extensively throughout the country by our goods, we are desirous to have our Pipes which are considered equaled by none—still more extensively used by those who relish a good smoke, and find Cigars too expensive. Therefore we have reduced our prices to the following:

We will sell 1 No. 2 Pipe for $5, and charge $1 additional for every number higher: therefore No. 4 costs $6; No. 8, $10; No. 12, $15, &c. Pipes from No. 4 to No. 8 are considered first-rate sizes; from No. 8 upward, large sizes. The price included a Case and Stem.

Nice Amber Mouthpieces for Welchsel Stems we are selling from $1 to $3 a piece.

We send by Express to collect on delivery, amount and express charges. But suggest that the amount be sent in Registered Letter or Post-Office Money Order in advance, to save consignee the express-return charges.

In conclusion, we wish to state that we warrant all our goods (which we stamp with our name) to be real Amber, genuine Meerschaum, and to color, and will readily give every information in regard to it, based on thirty years' experience in the business. Having received Diploma for the respective articles at Europe; and we will ever uphold the fair fame we have acquired in the introduction of the MANUFACTURE OF GENUINE MEERSCHAUM GOODS in this country.

We cut Pipes and Cigar-Holders of any shape or design, mount them, do repairing, boiling, and polishing. Also, Amber Mouthpieces, and, mail or express them to any part of the country. The respectable references are in possession of commendations from thousands of our customers, representing all classes of society.

MR. SUMNER'S SPEECH IN ENGLAND.

IT is a great misfortune that the London newspapers, instead of printing MR. SUMNER'S speech, so that every body might have seen exactly what he said, should have given what they called an abstract of it, with their comments. Those Englishmen who pride themselves upon fair play must have been indignant with a course which is as unjustifiable as it is unhandsome an interpretation. And it is precisely this kind of action which makes the rest of the world smile at the loud claim of fair play in which John Bull so often indulges. The speech evidently produced a profound excitement. The Pall Mall Gazette speaks of the "fruitlessness of further negotiations, and the necessity of being prepared for war." The Daily News remarks that "MR. SUMNER not only presents a bill of five hundred millions, but demands that we should pay it on our knees." The Morning Star speaks of "demands which are utterly untenable, and ought to be resisted." The Sun, and the News are our especial friends in the London press. The Pall Mall Gazette is an organ of the governing class. The observations of the Times upon American affairs are wholly unimportant. It represents nothing but a guess at public opinion, and expresses none of the convictions that make it.

In consideration of these comments of the London press, MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY has written a letter to the Tribune. MR. M'CARTHY is entitled to speak, not only as "a British subject happening to be in New York," but as a gentleman familiar with our politics, friendly to this country, and recently editorially attached to the London Morning Star. He says that MR. SUMNER is regarded as the most pacific and the calmest of American Senators, and what he said upon the subject was naturally supposed to be the least that any American could say. If, therefore, he hoped that the question might be settled without war, the inference was that public opinion in this country had resolved upon a settlement, even at the cost of war. "England," says MR. M'CARTHY, "is just now convinced that General GRANT'S government means to put a pistol to her head at once, and then demand the settlement of the Alabama claims."

His remark is justified by the tone of the comments of which we have spoken. MR. SUMNER is understood to claim in behalf of the more moderate of the Southern States that England owe apologies for her recognition of the rebels as belligerents; that she shall pay the actual losses to American commerce by the depredations of the rebel pirates; and that she shall also pay the cost of the ships that might have been built except for her attitude, of the commerce that might have been carried on, and also the expense of a year or two of the war. Now, if JOHN BRIGHT were understood, under similar circumstances, to have made such demands of this country in the name of our friends in England, what would probably be the tone of our newspaper comment? Is it wholly improbable that even those of us who most deprecate any misunderstanding with England would say that if this were really the ground of moderate men and of our friends in England, we must begin to prepare the strength of our navy?

The great reason of our regret that the English papers did not publish MR. SUMNER'S speech is that every reader would then have seen what he did say, not what excited editors might represent him as saying. MR. SUMNER is not Secretary of State, and, as we remarked at the time, his speech is not the sketch of a treaty. Nor does he say where say in his speech what the terms of a treaty should be. He insists that the settlement is desirable, but not as a necessary step toward it, he states amply and forcibly the scope and character of the American claims. But he goes no further. Having stated in the long list of grievances he adds: "It will be for a wise statesmanship to determine how this fearful accumulation, like Pelion upon Ossa, shall be removed out of sight." And again: "Be the claims more or less, they are honestly presented, with the conviction that they are just, and they should be considered candidly." These are not the words of an ultimatum; and had the London newspapers published the speech there are thoughtful men enough in England who would have seen that they are not.

Happily this question will be considered upon both sides of the ocean by such men, and their opinion will be heard and felt. Fortunately, also, the chip-on-the-shoulder diplomacy will not be encouraged by Secretary FISH, and the last few years have educated a class of men in this country whose voice and judgment are not to be overborne by the clamor of "insult." The United States have proved their power, and it is their duty to very way that they can do not abuse it. Those who talk lightly of war any where are very young or very foolish. Those who say that they should rather like a war with England are men to be distrusted. No greater misfortune could befall the world than such an event; and all honest and patriotic men in both countries will do what they can to reason together as friends, not to gibe and denounce as enemies.

MANTEROLA IN NEW YORK.

THE citizens of New York who are sufficiently interested in their taxes to read the levies which were passed by the late Legislature—after reducing by one-half the appropriations for charitable purposes of six millions of dollars—will observe that twenty per cent. of the Excise fund is to be given to private schools. This sum will be distributed among the thousand dollars, which will be chiefly claimed, it was intended it should be, by the Roman Catholic schools.

This is but another illustration of the pertinacious attempt of that ecclesiastical organization to destroy the Public School system of the State. The people of New York tax themselves every year to support free common schools for all the children of the State. They insist, however, that as there is no State religion, the religion, the Roman Catholic shall not be prostituted to sectarian purposes. If any sect insists that its peculiar tenets shall be taught in schools, it is at liberty to establish and support them, but it has no right to demand the money of the people for that purpose. Nor has the Legislature any right to give it. It could as justly have resolved that one-half of the Excise fund should be given to the opera bouffe, or to any other exclusively private enterprise.

This grant has been made by Legislature in which the majority was Republican, but, as we have already remarked, such measures were carried only by the connivance of a few Republican members, few else than those Senators were passed at all only because three Republican Senators, MESSRS. MATTOON, VAN PETTEN and WILLIAMS, deserted their party. Democrats and Republicans voted for the sectarian enemies of our free Common School system. It is a step nearer to the concession of the proportional division of the school fund to the sects, and such a concession is the end of the system. The tendency of such measures is fatal to intelligent popular government.

The State demands the education of all its citizens and provides for them. But if it provides also for their sectarian instruction, it will mean that itself taxing its own resources to support schools in which doctrines fundamentally incompatible with the Republican principle are taught. When Spain feels the birth throe of the Republic, she denounces the Church as the fatal foe of her welfare. The fervid orator who condemns the church to which she has been so long subservient, she denounces the union as the fatal foe of her welfare. The fervid orator who condemns the church to which she has been so long subservient, she denounces the union as the condition of her permanent release from ecclesiastical thralldom. But if the Priest MANTEROLA could have persuaded the Cortes to grant money to support the private schools of his sect, he would have effected precisely what has been done by the Legislature of New York. It is because the Democratic party of the State has become so much under the control of those who sympathize with this ecclesiastical party, that its return to power would be so serious a blow to some of the most valuable safeguards of the popular principle and government.

A SHORT REPLY.

A CORRESPONDENT in Illinois takes us to task for asking who are the people in this country outside of the great political parties; and he also insists that the loaning men have not a single representative in Congress, nor any friend except SENATOR SPRAGUE whom, according to our correspondent, all the leading parties are trying to destroy because he has the courage to tell the people that they are cheated and deceived.

But we are still of the opinion that the voting people of the country, the adult males, generally belong to one of the two great parties. There are very few persons who vote for the Democratic party and not for the Republican the next, and the party majorities in the States very slowly change. What we say is, that the great body of the people do not take an every election to read the platforms and consider the candidates of the parties—but have already decided that the success of one or the other party is essential to the public welfare. Of course there are some who are not party men in this sense; who vote now with one party, now with another; but they are the exceptions.

Our correspondent, for instance, voted for General GRANT. We have no doubt that he also voted for MR. SEYMOUR. And if his business should seriously dwindle and his taxes continue to be very heavy he might very possibly think that the fire would be no worse than the frying-pan, and so vote with the other party. But this is exceptional. The people, that is, the voters, are undoubtedly the Government in this country. They vote with the parties, not out of them; and as parties change but slowly, because they represent certain great general principles and policies, the people do not go with a tremendous majority one way this year and another the next. Even when the great overthrow of the Democratic policy of slavery-extension and protection was accomplished, it was only after a long and strenuous struggle, and then not by an actual majority of all the voters.

As for the doctrines of Senator SPRAGUE, we do not consciously oppose them, because, after reading his speeches, we do not know what they are. That they are not composed of lawyers, and is therefore a tyrannical body, which, as he said at the Cooper Institute, he has been "obliged, contrary to my nature, to antagonize myself with for the benefit of my country and my country's people," is a view of the Senate requiring a special investigation, for which the public has not time. That there is immense corruption in the country, and horrible extravagance, and that capital is a perilous power, we are certainly disposed to admit. But when the Senator invites people to "antagonize the ideas" which he expresses, but "to keep their hands" off him, the difficulty is to discover the ideas to be antagonized. A volley of declamation about "viciousness enthroned in legislation" can not be accepted as a statement of ideas.

We advise our Illinois correspondent to await the Senator's suggestions. When he says that "his words find a response in every true laborer's heart," he probably means only that at a time when the burdens upon labor are heavy a man in high position who declares the Senate or the Government to be responsible for them is sure to receive the labor. But this is certainly nothing very new. It is, indeed, one of the oldest "dodges" in history. But what practical remedy does Senator propose to lighten those burdens? We all know also in general that there is a great deal of corruption in politics. Indeed, we heard a Rhode Islander say within a fortnight that MR. DOYLE is re-elected Mayor of Providence you will hear that it means that the people of the city support Senator SPRAGUE; but what really mean only that he has spent more money than ever!" If the Senator knows of cases of corruption in the Senate or elsewhere he ought not to talk about "the ideas in the air dogs, but tell us what he knows. If, also, he has any ideas upon the proper financial policy of the country, we assure our Illinois friend that the newspapers will give him a candid hearing.

WHAT FIXES THE PRICE OF GOLD?

So far as our cities on the Atlantic are concerned the question in this form is proper, inasmuch as gold and silver were demonetized by the act of February, 1862, which made Treasury notes a legal tender. There are many who still insist that our legislation has created a fictitious and their depreciation below gold—the latter being treated as the standard—but they overlook the controlling force of this act.

In the opinion delivered by MR. CHASE, as that of the majority of the Supreme Court of the United States, it is held that there are two kinds of legal tender, the one in force before the war, and the one into which imparted this function to coined money, and the other created by the act of February, 1862.

Until that decision was pronounced in a recent case the belief was general throughout the United States that the old legal tender act applicable to gold and silver was superseded by that act of February, but although the question before the Court in that case was simply whether the act of 1862 applied to a contract made previously to its date, "Attorney gold and silver coin," and the majority of the Court did not limit themselves to a decision of this point, but laid down rules more appropriate to legislation, and to contracts made after the act of 1862 took effect payable in coin, and to contracts since made payable in currency, which, of course, because they maintained, would be legal—still, the country has accepted these obiter dicta as being the adjusted law of the land, inasmuch as it is supposed that in other cases before the Court these points will hereafter be fully decided. But so few are the contracts made payable in coin, as compared with those to be performed in our legalized paper-money, that the act of 1862 must be regarded as having fixed the principal standard. It is a peculiar one, however, as it is a promise to pay the coined dollar, in which, however, it is not redeemed.

Although the price of gold, measured by greenbacks, is determined by the general law of demand and supply, various causes are at work which appear to control its operation. Duties are collected in gold and gold is paid for interest by the Government, and whatever balance remains due for imports over and above our exports must be paid in coin. But notwithstanding that there is a large annual excess of imports, and that we pay an immense sum to Europe for interest, there has been no recent demand for the shipment of coin; on the contrary, the price of gold has been as low as if the state of foreign trade were satisfactory. It is of course well known that this fact is due to the heavy sales of our bonds in Europe, and to the loans made both here and abroad by foreign capitalists on these securities.

Since the inauguration of General GRANT these loans—many of them from their peculiar features called options in Wall Street—have been much diminished on account of the ease with which the bonds, therefore deposited as collateral, were sold. This is favorable, inasmuch as a large amount of floating debt has been paid off from the proceeds of such sales; but eventually the amount of permanent debt due by us to the other side must seriously tell upon our industry.

The panic in London in 1866 was followed by a large demand for coin from this country. Our expectation of it in that year amounted to about seventy millions of dollars. The Treasury, then under the charge of MR. M'CULLOCH, aided this tendency by heavy sales of Treasury gold. It was at the time claimed, in behalf of MR. M'CULLOCH, that putting out this gold then was good policy, as its export abroad gave ease to markets which purchased our bonds, and which would have returned them but for this advantage.

Since this time the agents of foreign capitalists in this country have almost uniformly sought to keep down the price of gold. The large English and German houses checked the speculation in gold of 1867 and 1868 by sales of their own. They had gold to sell—the proceeds of these bonds—and it is not improbable that they supposed the tendency would be supported by the Government toward returning to specie payments. They were misled, also, to remain in a situation to ship coin to their principals at the lowest price if they needed to do so.

The opinion has prevailed among the coin financiers that the price of gold has all along been determined chiefly by the operations of the Government, or by the fear of its sales at a time when the gold amounts were low in the Treasury; but the better opinion is that the price arose from these combined causes.

The amount of bonds now within the reach of foreign capitalists is not large; and we now, therefore, approach that period in our financial condition when our customs receipts will be limited to such imports as we can pay for with our exports, and when excessive accumulations of gold in the Treasury can not be expected. It scarcely need be said that our large imports are due to the free sale of our bonds, and that when these sales cease, we must fall back on what our industry produces.

The state of things which must soon be scarcely fixed is this:

1. Our paper currency, consisting of three per cent. certificates, Treasury notes not payable at interest, National Bank, and fractional issues, amount to about $692,000,000. That this amount is at least two hundred millions in excess of what is required to permit the ordinary circulation of the precious metals in this country must be conceded. When the extraordinary circumstances we have mentioned cease to operate, this excess of paper must fall upon the price of gold with more certainty than it has lately done.

2. The annual payment of interest and dividends in Europe, which will amount to sixty millions of dollars, will soon be turned from an apparent fiction into a weighty reality.

3. The country will then be compelled to pay its coin not only for its excess of imports over exports, but also for this interest in addition, both of which burdens will then for the first time be felt.

It is said that the German bankers have already announced that the foreign market is sufficiently supplied with bonds, and are giving much attention to such reports, it is very clear that the rope is growing taut, and that prudent men must prepare for the resection which can not long be postponed. If in 1865 the Secretary of the Treasury could have foreseen the estimate placed upon our bonds by European holders, it would not have been difficult, that knowing our great strength, to have returned to specie payments; but having exhausted this resource, not only without accomplishing that object, but with a disadvantage of a greater remove from it, we must summon all our fortitude to meet the contingencies now before us with courage and honor.

THE HARVARD AND OXFORD BOAT RACE.

THE Harvard University Boat Club have challenged the Oxford University Club for a race of four oars, and the challenge has been accepted. The race is to be rowed with coxswains from Putney to Mortlake; that is, upon English water, and in the English manner. We observe that there is a great deal of doubt of the result expressed, or rather that the chances are to be considered in advance to our English cousin. It is said that he has so many more men to choose from; that they are so used to rowing together; that they know the route, and that they are accustomed to a coxswain.

But of course our American athletes will be upon the ground—that is, the water—some weeks before the trial, and will acquaint themselves thoroughly with all its peculiarities. Then they will be accomplished rowers, perfectly trained, and they will have the honor of the universal Yankee nation in their charge. For ourselves, we do not accept the forebodings of many of the papers that we have seen. We shouldn't a Harvard man, fitted for rowing and carefully disciplined, strong, supple, wiry, calm, and resolute — for such, of course, the chosen heroes will be—why shouldn't he do as well with his oar as cousin Bull? Rowing is not so old a tradition in our colleges as it is in the England, but it has been practiced for many years, and it is a profound and intricate a science as to require successive generations for its mastery. Dancing, also, is a very much older practice in England than with us, but we should willingly challenge the drawing-rooms of England to a bout of "dancers dancing in time."

If the challenge had been of another kind—say a contest in writing Greek verses—we might have been less hopeful, for reasons that could be readily stated. As it is, we doubt upon one point only, and that is the old universal test of English over the French, phlegm. The circumstances are so extraordinary, the consciousness of the Harvard crew that they are combating Englishmen as Englishmen with both countries looking on, may be so overpowering that a little nervousness may betray all. Phlegm, gentlemen, phlegm in all that you may undertake is sibly not that. Then slow, sure, steady—and Putney and Mortlake shall be immortal names in the Fasti of Harvard.

EX-POLICE COMMISSIONER ACTON.

THE retirement of THOMAS C. ACTON from the Board of Police Commissioners, of which he has been so long President, is deeply regretted by all those who honor the devotion of great abilities and energies to the public service with no other reward than the consciousness of the most important duties most efficiently done.

In times of any anticipated trouble Mr. ACTON was always at his post, calm, vigilant, prompt; dealing with disorder and danger in the same spirit of intelligent mastery with which a General superintends great operations in the field. Such unwearied intensity and unquenchable sense of temperament, allied to the most admirable executive qualities, always implied victory. Fearless, modest, and untiring—it is certainly not too much to say, and his accomplishments will be the first to declare, that the efficiency of the Metropolitan Police, which had become very much a model force, was especially due to Mr. ACTON. During the riots of 1863 the force was as brave and effective as a regiment that decides a battle. For three days, indeed, it fought the most trying and difficult battle. But helped to win one of the great triumphs of the war.

Mr. ACTON is comparatively a young man; but his incessant devotion to duties which in their nature are so relentless and exhaustive, has so impaired his health that he is compelled to resign. A warmest petition, signed by the most eminent citizens of all sympathies, was presented to him, asking him still to retain the office. But he had satisfied himself that total relief from the onerous responsibility was essential, and he properly persisted in his resignation. No public officer has merited warmer thanks from the great city, and as he retires from his arduous office we are glad to believe that he will be followed by the most grateful respect of all good citizens.

SPANISH PROJECTS.

THE Spanish Cortes, by the decisive vote of 182 to 64, has rejected the proposition to make Spain a republic, and is discussing the project of a triennial Directory to be appointed by the Cortes. Neither fact is surprising: but both show that the hold of the monarchical form upon Spain is not strong. The more cautious revolutionists may naturally fear the sudden conversion of the government into the most popular one, while they probably regard the Directory as a bridge by which the country can pass from the old form to the new. Yet the Constitution as sketched already provides for universal suffrage in the election of the Cortes. The Directory is to be named by that body apparently for three years. But what is to happen if the Cortes and its creature, the Directory, differ, is not stated. The probable result would be that of the difference between the British Lords and Commons and the French Assembly—a successful coup d'état or civil war. The Directory would disperse the Cortes, or the Cortes would overthrow the Directory.

Further debate will very probably expose the difficulties, and indeed the impracticabilities of an executive power appointed by the legislature, yet independent of it. If the Spaniards do not wish for a monarchy, the republic is the only seeming alternative. The expectation of politically educating a nation to a republic by a kind of interregnum of semi-monarchy is one of the favorite fallacies of doctrinaires; and if the suffrage become general in Spain, and no single leader, like LOUIS NAPOLEON, turns it to his own purposes, it will inevitably control the Government. A Directory of three or five members will be nothing unless there be a man of real force in it. If there be, he must be a Spaniard of great principle and moderation not to aim at something more. If there be more than one such man, they will be in constant peril of division.

As yet it is certainly creditable to the leaders in this remarkable Spanish revolution that they have not apparently attempted any false play. Even ESCALAR, the ablest of the extreme liberals, has no suspicion of PRIM himself, and asks why Spain should not be content with a government composed of the acknowledged and trusted liberal leaders. A more sensible question was never asked. Nor is it likely that the Cortes, elected by universal suffrage, and founding a government upon the same principle, should not give the natural answer to such a question. The result, however, not doubtful. The tone of the Cortes is not reactionary, and as yet there is nothing in the condition of the country to produce a reaction. The monarchical parties have not dared to make any serious attempts, and the peaceful acceptance of the Spanish situation by the other European powers is a moral feature of the revolution. The revolution has developed a party in full and intelligent sympathy with the most advanced political thought of the time—a party so strong as to be able to exploit the tranquillity of the country. It would be interesting to know if this sentiment is broad enough to dispose properly of the colonial question, which has been usually the weakness of parent states. Even LOUIS NAPOLEON has stoutly contended for the "autonomy of peoples," which is imperial for self-government. If the resolution of Cuba to be an independent state should be plainly evident, would a man like ESCALAR, for instance, who is instructed as well as ambitious, insist that the foreign policy of clinging to American possessions at all costs shall be the policy of new Spain?

MR. SWEENEY'S BOARD.

A FEW weeks since, in speaking of Mr. SWEENEY'S plan for the reorganization of the Public School system of this city, we said that we remarked that the effort was not a new one; for during the last autumn it was proposed to turn out Mr. BOESE, the efficient and experienced Secretary of the Board of Education, and replace him by Mr. HITCHMAN, whom we described as a young New York politician, and as the political friend of Messrs. SWEENEY, TWEED, HALL, & Company, who manage the party." We added that Mr. HITCHMAN warmly supported Mr. SWEENEY'S bill.

Mr. HITCHMAN, in his place in the Assembly, called attention to our remarks, said that they were wholly unfounded, and that he should support the bill or not as he thought best. A few days later he warmly advocated the bill in committee. He voted for it in the House. It became a law—and we observe that at the first meeting of the new Board of Education, Mr. SWEENEY, & Company's Commissioners Mr. HITCHMAN was elected Secretary. We hope that he may be as diligent and admirable an officer as Mr. BOESE. But what did he gain by denying that he supported Mr. SWEENEY'S bill?

THE NEW HAVEN RAILROAD.

THE Superintendent of the New Haven Railroad states, in his late report, that during the past thirteen years ending March 31, 1869, 18,527,211 passengers have been carried over the road without an accident to any train while on that road that caused the loss of a single life or limb to any passenger so transported. This is a very agreeable statement, and we should have supposed that the accident near Harlem, by which MRS. GODWIN and others were so seriously injured, was within the period. It would have been interesting to remark how many lives had been lost, and how many accidents had occurred through carelessness or otherwise upon the road. But we are very glad to publish so striking a fact as that mentioned, and to know that a road which is necessarily so much traveled is managed with such care and success. There is nothing more advantageous to railroad property than the public conviction that life and limb are secure upon it.

THE MORE HASTE THE WORSE SPEED.

DID the Daily Sentinel of Raleigh, North Carolina, ever hear of the man who suddenly burst out upon a neighbor whom he met with a volley of tremendous oaths and imprecations; declaring him to all conceivable points here and hereafter; raging more and more as he swore, until he was a wholly melancholy spectacle; and when the neighbor calmly asked what he was talking about, the swearer replied, "What am I talking about? Why, about you who have been insulting me!"

"You are very much mistaken."

"What! you didn't say that I was a monolith, nor a vulgar fraction, nor a gynæcium?"

"No."

"Well," replied the man, walking away, "if any body should ever call me so you know now what I should say."

The Daily Sentinel prints the following words, and declares they are from Harper's Weekly: "One wonders that the South does not rebel anew when he considers the miserable vermin who have been sent down there as Government officials." Thereupon, of course, Harper's Weekly is "a vile sheet," "a stench," "a traducer of our best and truest and bravest," and a great many other disagreeable things. Of course the paragraph is to be found ever appeared in this paper, except, possibly, as a quotation from some Copperhead critic. We remember one instance of the kind, where certain foul abuse of President LINCOLN was quoted in illustration of some point—probably of Copperhead veracity or urbanity—and it was straightway published as our opinion of Mr. LINCOLN. However, if any paper should hereafter use the words falsely attributed to us, we now know what the Sentinel would say of it.

NOTES.

PERHAPS our readers have not seen the following pleasant little illustration of the fact that some kind of preparation for the civil service—say the rudiments of a common English education—would not be entirely superfluous. This is a letter from a person recently in high official position:

JAN 10th 1869.

Dear Stewart

I am in Receipt of yours of 18th Inst. I wrote Honorous that C. Eaton had large interests in the Consulate and would probably be right, as soon as the Appropriations were mald. I shel come to Washington Just as soon as I can get before it but I believed by 15th of Febr. I shel come on and we can then fix all up.

About the House I will see you on that matter also what not clause on the House now.

Now Good Luck to you. I hope and more profitabel enterprise than Indian Business can be. I can place you and Honorous in it to costs nothing only to get a Bill endorced by Congress to pay Interest on State Bonds for Levee purposes this will work and cost nothing.

Why did you notpit Apt as I wrote you by Sollicitor to appear in the matter you let A good thing slip.

I wish you would do all you can for Col Carey Apt in my place I am sure to have him Apointed for Several Reasons if he is Apt I will Join you and Remaine In. St Co, and the South and forward business to you, for I could then have a base for A fine business and all claims and suits coming through the Custom House I could place it properly and I feel it is all ours and but Hard Delay.

Write me soon all of the news, and believe me

Truly your friend

ONE of the most novel, beautiful, interesting, and permanently valuable of recent books of travels is Mr. WALLACE'S "Malay Archipelago." It is the work of a scientific enthusiast who spent eight years among the Malay islands, traveling in many journeys of various lengths, collecting a hundred and twenty-five thousand valuable specimens, which he brought with him to England. He devoted six years to the preparation of his book, so that it represents the careful research and study of fourteen years. The HARPERS have issued it in a solid volume, profusely illustrated with engravings, maps, and photographic likenesses of remarkable birds and insects. The "Malay Archipelago" is by far the most complete and admirable survey we have ever had of the natural history of that grand region, the home of the orang-utan and the Bird of Paradise, and of the fury, the bird that appears sometimes in poetry, but is here the most familiar of all. Of course the book is full of English explorer and naturalist does not want episodes of lively and romantic adventure, and we heartily commend the book to all who wish a fresh and delightful and most instructive volume for a summer companion.

AMONG the new novels issued by the HARPERS are LEVER'S "That Boy of Norcott's," which is recorded to be his best work since "Harry Lorrequer" and "Charles O'Malley," and "Breaking a Butterfly" by the author of "Guy Livingstone" "Rathbury," and ANTHONY TROLLOPE'S admirable "Phineas Finn, the Irish Member," and the first part of his new novel, "He Knew he was Right." Nor will any reader of Harper's Magazine forget the "Dodge Club," one of the most delightful sketches of a pleasant ever published, and which is now issued in an illustrated volume. The HARPERS' series of "Standard Novels" is the compact volumes of the most standard historical manuals.

We are glad to observe that a recent English work "On Labor; its wrongful claims and rightful dues; its actual present and possible future," by WILLIAM THOMAS THORNTON, is announced for republication by Messrs. LEYPOLDT & HOLT. Mr. THORNTON is the author of a work upon Indian Finance, which is called by the most competent authorities, JOHN STUART MILL and Professor CAIRNES, the best book extant upon that subject. The present work upon Labor is the fruit of long and conscientious study of the subject to which it is devoted; and although there will naturally be differences of opinion upon some of the theoretical issues which it raises, the value of the contribution which it makes to the knowledge of the actual position of the laboring class will not be questioned. The spirit of the book is truly humane. The author treats his subject as of the highest importance not exclusively to any class, but to the common welfare of society; and, with much copious knowledge, careful thought, and admirable feeling that no one interested in the subject can afford to neglect it. We commend it especially to those who are personally engaged in trades unions.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

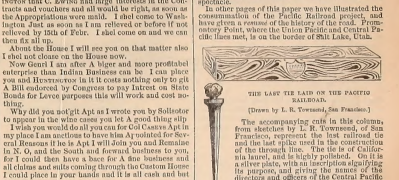
WAR WITH THE INDIANS.

A Peace Convention has just been held to put a stop to the war upon the Indians. But, in the meantime, the Indians seem to be inclined toward war. The Sioux, the North, and the Cheyennes, the Arapahoes, Kiowas, and Comanches in the South, do not show a pacific disposition. A report from General Sheridan dated Fort Ellis, Montana, April 10, says that "Major BAKER on the 23d of March met a detachment of soldiers and citizens and a hostile band of Indians." Nine Indians were killed and one wounded; one soldier was killed and two wounded. No less than 100 ponies captured last winter by General Custer have started north without permission from the proper authorities, to join Tall Bull on the Canadian frontier, so that at the lowest estimate there must be near about six hundred warrior ponies and families in the old familiar quarter—the vicinity of Republican, Solomon, and Saline creeks.

The elections in Virginia are ordered for the 6th of July. Separate votes are to be taken on certain clauses of the Constitution.

The whipping-post and pillory recently erected in the jail-yard at New Castle, Delaware, to take the place of the ancient and dilapidated one, was inaugurated on the 18th of May by the pilloring of three men convicted of petty offenses, and the flogging of a fourth convicted of like misdemeanors. A crowd of gaping men, women, and children witnessed the disgusting spectacle.

The latest phase of this paper we have illustrated the consummation of the Pacific Railroad project, and have given a portrait of the leader of the Central Pacific Company, where the Union Pacific and Central Pacific lines met, is on the border of Salt Lake, Utah.



THE LAST TIE LAID ON THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

(Drawn by L. E. Tenney, San Francisco.)

The accompanying cuts in this column, from sketches by L. R. Townsend, of San Francisco, represent the last spike driven and the last spike used in the construction of the three lines. The first is of the golden maul, and is highly polished. On it is a silver plate, with an inscription specifying its purpose, and giving the names of the directors and officers of the Central Pacific Railroad Company. The spike is of gold, weighing eighteen ounces, and valued at three hundred and fifty dollars. It contains

THE LAST SPIKE. the following inscription: "The last spike with this sentiment added: 'May God continue the unity of our country as this railroad unites the two great oceans of the world.'"

FOREIGN NEWS.

Mr. SUMNER'S speech has created considerable excitement in England. But the better class of British citizens sympathize with the justice of Mr. SUMNER'S claim. The London Spectator says: "On the whole, Mr. SUMNER'S speech deserves to be deeply read by Englishmen; there is far greater candor on both sides of the Atlantic." Those who feel keenly are the Irish. Another stronghold of Mr. SUMNER'S case against England, ought to be found among those who are inflamed by reasoning that keen sense of regret and mortification which we recently laboriously tried to suppress. The Queen of Great Britain and Ireland entertain with regard to the conduct of her ruling class and the Government during the first four years of the civil war.

The Fenian prisoners were set free on the 23d of May. In the course of the month disorder attends political excitements in Paris, and the police are frequently forced to interfere.

The remains of Daniel O'Connell were on the 14th reinterred in the cemetery at Glasnevin, near Dublin, where a handsome monument has been constructed for their reception. The ceremonies were very imposing, and were conducted by the archbishops and bishops. Crowds of people followed the remains to the tomb, and it is estimated that over eight thousand were present on the grounds.

The question of the possession of Gibraltar has been brought up in the Spanish Cortes. The Cortes received but small support in this from the Government fully recognized the importance of the Gibraltar question. It would also discuss the relations of Church and State.

The Pope has issued a decree against the pernicious works of the Journal de Paris as to the strength of the French Catholic population at present. The latter journal has fixed the number of men actually under arms at 1,000,000. The decree states that there are but somewhat more than the 1st of April to the 1st of September in which 1,000,000 men can be sent to war. Then can be called in, and the army thus raised to a total of 1,267,000 men. But from December 1st to the 1st of March, 1870, when the contingent of 1868 will join, the total strength of the army will be increased by 75,000 men, and amount in the aggregate to 644,000 men. Deduct the 400,000 men who have only about twenty months to go, and the 50,000 men who form the garrison of Algeria, and the 1,000,000 men—we have a force of 550,000 to bring forward whenever circumstances require it.

Several Mennonites has presented to the Italian Senate a bill requiring for the illicit grinding of corn as well as grinders. And yet it is melancholy to remember that the total consumption of bread-stuffs per head and that to one boy there will be found at least seven adults.

The total amount of the gifts presented to the Pope on occasion of his fifty-seventh anniversary is estimated at 500,000.

Those who at all doubt the assurance of the political economist that the population of the world is prodigiously on the increase will find their skepticism set at rest by the returns of the registrations in England and Wales for 1868. The marriages were 176,126, the births 788,186, and the deaths 485,617, leaving a total increase of 302,569 persons to the world's population over and above the usual annual loss.

THE CORCORAN ART DEPOSITORY.

We give on this page a view of the building which Mr. W. W. CORCORAN, a wealthy banker of Washington, has recently presented to the United States Government for an Art Depository. It is located near the War Department, on the corner of Pennsylvania Avenue and Twenty-seventh Street. It has been occupied for several years as the Quarter-master's Department. All the back rents due on this account have been canceled by Mr. CORCORAN. The building is to be held in perpetuity by nine trustees as a free public art gallery. He has also donated a large collection of paintings and other works of art. The value of the property is estimated at one million of dollars. It is stated that AUGUST BELMONT, of New York, has written to Mr. CORCORAN, authorizing the trustees, when they shall have entered upon their trust, to choose from his collection twelve pictures, which he will thereupon convey to them, to be added to the gallery as the "Belmont contribution." Mr. CORCORAN has long been known as a generous patron of art; the edifice which he has donated to the Government is considered one of the best specimens of architecture in Washington.

DEMOLITION OF THE NEW YORK CITY HOSPITAL GROUNDS.

ONE of the old landmarks of New York city is being rapidly effaced. Every one acquainted with Broadway has noticed the beautiful hospital grounds near the head of Pearl Street. They have for many years remained like an oasis in the desert, and we can not help regretting that the necessities of commerce compel their abandonment. The hospital is to be removed up town. This hospital was erected nearly one hundred years ago, and it has become one of the most extensive schools of surgical practice in this country. In 1868 the number of persons received as medical or surgical patients was 2613, of which one half were seamen.

The grounds, consisting of five acres, were tastefully laid out. The grass seemed greener and brighter there than any where else, and the trees were among the oldest and most beautiful on the island. There was a double row of stately elms, which it seems almost cruel to cut down. But the pathetic song of "Woodman, Spare that Tree!" however appropriate, is now unavailing. Trade must have its way, though it swallow up every thing green or beautiful in its path.

COLUMBIA MARKET, BETHNAL GREEN, LONDON.

AMONG those who have devoted their means to the amelioration of the working-class in England stand foremost Mr. PEABODY, the American banker, and Miss BURDETT COUTTS, the wealthiest woman in England. Their efforts in this connection furnish examples which our wealthy American capitalists might well imitate.

We give on page 341 an illustration of the handsome and commodious market-place which Miss COUTTS has erected adjoining her set of model dwellings for working-class families in Bethnal Green, London. Our cut gives an interior view of the quadrangle, showing the court, etc.

The beneficent objects Miss COUTTS has in view in establishing the market are to supply the surrounding poor with wholesome food at a fair rate; to bring the producer and consumer into closer communication with each other; and to promote habits of industry and thrift among the humblest class of traders. Another object was considered desirable—namely, the provision of better lodgings for City clerks, who complain, with reason, that while model dwellings are provided in various parts of London for the working-classes, they are still left to the discomforts and expenses of inferior lodgings, far away from their daily occupation.

The plan of the market consists of four blocks of buildings, with arcades, surrounding an open quadrangle. Each of the buildings comprises six shops and two wings, flanking a central archway leading to the quadrangle. The shops are four stories high. Their accommodation consists of kitchen, cellar, store, and closets in the basement; shop, parlor or office, and private entrance on the ground-floor; and sitting-room and four bedrooms on the two stories above. They are intended for first-class dealers. The wings are four stories high, exclusive of their basements. One wing is occupied as a tavern, and the others are divided into residences for clerks and tenants of a middle class. Each dwelling occupies a separate story, approached by a common staircase, and contains parlor, kitchen, scullery, store, closets, and four bedrooms. The central archway, which leads to the quadrangle, has stores and cellars in its basement and a suit of rooms above, intended, like those in the wings, for tenants of a middling class. The third or topmost story is carried up as a tower, and contains large filtering cisterns, which supply all the buildings with water.

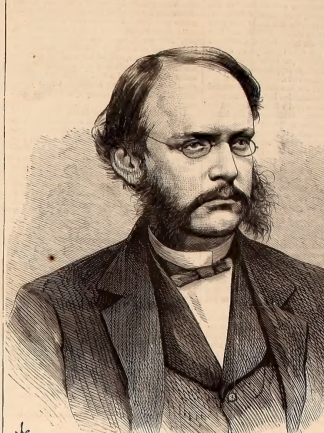
The quadrangle has an area of 14,000 superficial feet, paved with blue granite, divided by lines of red granite into spaces 6 feet square, which are to be the stations for costermongers. In the centre is a lamp, surrounded by four granite basins, with hydrants for washing; there is a fountain under each arcade. The market-hall is divided into seven bays by clustered Aberdeen granite pillars, with bronze capitals and bands, supporting the timber roof, which is 50 feet high. The floor of the hall has an area of 2600 superficial feet; and in the aisles, behind the pillars, are twenty-four small shops, lined with Irish marble, for the sale of meat, fish, and poultry; above are galleries for the sale of flowers and fruit. The buildings are substantially constructed of yellow brick, with Portland stone cornices and copings, and terra-cotta mouldings; the roofs are of green slate.

DAVID A. WELLS.

DAVID A. WELLS, Special Commissioner of Revenue, was born in June, 1828, at Springfield, Massachusetts. After graduating at Williams College, in 1847, he became an associate editor of the Springfield Republican. A decided taste for scientific pursuits made Mr. WELLS quit the editorial profession, and study with Professor AGASSIZ (who had then recently arrived in this country). He subsequently joined the Lawrence Scientific School, at Cambridge, where he graduated, and filled for a time the post of assistant professor. As a scientific man he took high rank, and was repeatedly invited to professorships in different colleges. He was widely and favorably known as the author of several educational books and treatises. Owing to failing health Mr. WELLS retired for a time from active life to a quiet residence in Troy, New York. "At the outbreak of the war," says the Cincinnati Commercial, "he watched it with an ardent, scholarly sympathy, as largely holding in its balance the destiny of man; and as year after year the havoc went on, and the mountain of debt increased, Mr. WELLS broke the despair of the loyal people with his pamphlet, 'Our Burden and our Strength'—one of the most original and startling brochures of political literature."

It showed resources yet undeveloped which would come to our assistance and meet our obligations, and excited so high a degree of hope and confidence that subscriptions to the National loans, which were then flagging, were at once renewed and stimulated. Of this pamphlet the Loyal Publication Society of New York printed and distributed immense numbers, while six other editions were published in Boston and other parts of the country, and two also in Europe. At the close of the war, when the consideration of the best methods of raising the large revenue necessary to meet the current expenditures and its interest on the debt became imperative, a Revenue Commission was established by Congress, on the recommendation of Mr. FESSENDEN, then Secretary of the Treasury, and by his successor, Mr. M'CULLOCH, and Mr. WELLS, with the approval of Congress, was made chairman. In 1866, the Revenue Commission having expired,



DAVID A. WELLS.

Congress made for Mr. WELLS the new office of "Special Commissioner of the Revenue," with instructions to examine and report on the resources of the country, the best methods of raising revenue, and the influence of taxation on the industry and development of the nation. The three reports which Mr. WELLS has made since he has held the office of Special Commissioner are a sufficient evidence of his qualifications for the discharge of the duties of his responsible office. Of the last report, in January, 1869, the leading Republican newspaper of the Northwest, the Chicago Tribune, says: "We do not award to this important state paper any higher praise than it deserves when we say that from the foundation of this Government to the present no public document equal to it in extent of research, comprehensiveness of treatment, depth of penetration, and honesty of purpose, has emanated from any one of the Departments."

Mr. WELLS has made himself thoroughly master of our political economy. His reports have foreshadowed the happy condition of the Treasury, the steady reduction of our great debt, and the remission of taxes. Single-handed, and against the conviction of his then superior, the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. M'CULLOCH, Mr. WELLS in his report of 1868 insisted on the total remission of the obnoxious internal tax on manufactures. He was also the persistent advocate of the 50-cent tax on whisky, thereby breaking up the infamous whisky-rings. We believe he is now engaged in revising the present unequal tariff, changing it wherever it is possible from an ad valorem to a specific duty. Mr. WELLS can certainly not be called a Free Trader in its unqualified meaning, but he is the decided enemy of monopolies, unequal taxation, and class legislation. He believes that a revenue tariff alone would not only develop our resources faster, but would bring us more rapidly than by any other method to specie payment. We hope to see Mr. WELLS serving the country for many years, and in positions adapted to his eminent ability and remarkable accomplishments.

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

THE foremost of the great projects for connecting by rail the Atlantic and Pacific coasts was realized May 10. At ten minutes past 4 o'clock P.M., at Promontory Point, Utah, the last rail was laid. The last spikes driven were presented by Nevada and Arizona. Then from Nevada was of silver. "To the iron of the East and the gold of the West," said the Hon. T. A. TUTTLE, representing that State, "Nevada adds her link of silver to span the continent and wed the oceans." By a connection of the telegraph with the last spike (a gold one, from California), the last blow given announced to the world the completion of the grand enterprise. A prayer was said by Rev. Dr. TODD, of Pittsfield; then the two last rails were laid simultaneously, one opposite the other—one for the Union Pacific Railroad, and one for the Central Pacific Railroad; the presentation of spikes and the responses followed; then the last spikes were driven by the two companies, and telegrams were sent to the President of the United States and to the Associated Press.

This remarkable event was celebrated with especial enthusiasm in Chicago and other Western cities. But in New York city, already the metropolis of a continent, but by this enterprise rendered the centre of the world's commerce, the news was calmly received; and, as on the occasion of the capture of Richmond, the event was celebrated by the singing of anthems, and not by a loud uproar. A salute was fired in the City Park; peals were rung from Trinity chimes, and a religious service was held in Trinity Church. The remarks made by the Rev. Dr. VINTON were so appropriate that we quote here a portion of his address:

"This is, indeed, a great event of the world; it is one of the victories of peace—a victory grander than those of war, which have in their track desolation, devastation, misery, and woe. It is a triumph of commerce—a triumph indicating free trade as a future law of the nation. . . . When we contemplate this achievement we can hardly realize the magnitude. Three thousand two hundred and eighty-five miles of continuous railway within four degrees of latitude and fifty degrees of longitude in the temperate zone. It began when the nation was agitated by war, and is finished now when we enjoy a reign of peace. When the ocean route was discovered around the Cape of Good Hope, it was very properly regarded as a blessing to mankind—hence the designation by which it is known; but the completion of this mighty work, which connects the two oceans, is a still greater blessing. In the olden times, when camels—those ships of the desert—were the means used for transportation, for the furtherance of commercial traffic, it was found that wherever the caravans stopped there would spring up cities, and there would be evidences of civilization. So with this great work. It will populate our vast territory, and be the great highway of the nations: their merchants will come it to trade with us. But there is another aspect in which we view it as a Christian, and in connection with which we esteem it of still greater importance. It will preserve the union of these States. Philosophers tell us, and we know ti to be true, that where there are rivers which diverge in their courses, and have separate and distinct outlets in Europe, there the nations become different, and the peoples are separated and disunited. But where, on the contrary, the topography is such that the rivers all flow into one common central basin, there is necessarily a concentration of interests and of peoples, and that territory is marked out by God to be under one Government. By the operation of this natural law we must regard it as decreed that there shall be a unity of people and of Government in all that territory which lies between the Alleghanies and the Rocky Mountains. Agreeably to this law, that territory, however, we find the rivers diverging, as in Europe, and, following the rule that obtains in the Old World, there might be a diffusion of interests and a separation of governments in that section of country divided from us by the Sierra Nevada and the Rocky Mountains. But this railway commenced on the natural tendency to disunion, has prevented a separation, and binds the Pacific and the Atlantic and Mississippi in one nation. Roman roads united and consolidated the Roman Empire. They were made the "highways of Emperors for the necessities of war and commerce," but, under Christian Emperors, they were the highways along which the Apostles and the missionaries of Christ carried the good tidings of salvation to the tribes of the peoples. So this Pacific Railway is a means, under Divine Providence, for propagating the Church and the Gospel from this, the youngest Christian nation, to the oldest land in the Orient, now settled in Paganism and Idolatry, and so will revive the worship of the True God and the Lord of our race among the farther East, the birth-place of Christianity.

Let us glance at the history of this enterprise. It is closely connected with the political and development of the last twenty years. At the close of the Mexican war, in 1848, California, New Mexico (including Arizona), and Texas were added to our territory, so that from the 32d to the 42d parallel of latitude there was no foreign territory between the Mississippi and the Pacific coast. The very next year thousands of miners from every quarter of the globe flocked to the gold fields of California; the greater number by sea, but very many through the Eastern States and over the unsettled regions of the far West. So, by what soon came to be known as the overland route. The necessity for a trans-continental route then became evident. Hon. Thomas H. BENTON, of Missouri, introduced a bill into the Senate in 1850, authorizing what may be called a stage-coach road, consisting of relays of the mail railroad interrupted occasionally by what were then supposed to be impassable natural obstacles. Three years later Congress appropriated the $150,-000 for six surveys of proposed routes for Pacific railroads, to be carried out by the War Department, of which JEFFERSON DAVIS was then Secretary. Among those who had been prominent in advocating the construction of this enterprise before the people the foremost was ASA WHITNEY. Congress, in 1853, appropriated $100,000 more, and three additional surveys were made.

The great problem of the engineers was how to overleap the Rocky Mountains, running through the centre of the vast trans-Mississippi region, which contains two-thirds of our entire territory. The Pacific surveys proved that this great chain of bear had a very broad back, that the slope up his sides was very gradual, and that his spine did not extrude unpleasantly in the way of the bear, on the contrary, the chine sunk between two rows of muscles or mountains on either side.

But very soon the Southern disunion sentiment cast a cloud over the political sky, and in this connection this important question arose, How would the Pacific roads stand? Their isolated position was keenly felt, and thus an additional motive offered for a railroad between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. The importance of California was beginning to be understood. Her gold, her climate, her grape culture, her trade with Eastern Asia; all these facts commanded attention. She stood the test of the Civil War, and proved herself loyal. Her own great and important lead her not to isolate herself, but, on the other hand, to seek a more rapid and convenient communication with the East. It was discovered that there was a practicable railroad route across the snow-clad Sierra through Donner Pass, midway between San Francisco and Virginia City. Some of the richest of California merchants pledged their entire fortunes to the realization of the project, the best engineering talent gave its support, and Congress was asked to grant a sitting subsidy.

It is needless here to describe the conflict which then sprang up between Chicago and St. Louis, each of which (the former backed by New York and the Northwest, and the latter by Philadelphia and the Middle States) sought to gain control of the great branch that was to unite and unite with that already proceeding from San Francisco. This was in 1862, when the Government was spending $2,000,000 a day in the work of the suppression of the Rebellion. It was in the midst of such a contest as this that in July, 1862, PRESIDENT LINCOLN signed the act granting a charter to the proprietors of the Pacific Railroad Companies. The Chicago capitalists had gained the victory, and Omaha (on the Missouri River) was fixed upon as the eastern terminus of the road to become, within 1,773 miles distant, Fort St. Louis was to be provided for by a subsidized branch line, to connect with the main line on or about the 100th meridian. This was given to the Eastern Division of the Union Pacific Railroad. The line from Sacramento to meet the Union Pacific was given to the Central Pacific Company. These three companies were all chartered and stood on an equal footing as regarded landgrants, loans, privileges, etc. Congress conferred upon the three companies the right of way, an absolute grant of 12,800 acres per mile of the public lands traversed, and authorized a special issue of 6 per cent. United States bonds, proportioned to each company according to the length and difficulty of the line, to be delivered as the work progressed. The bonds issued by the companies themselves were given the position of a first mortgage. The two classes of bonds and the other capital for the construction of the Union and Central Pacific roads amount in round numbers to $150,600,000, about equally divided between the two.

These two roads have been completed and the through line regularly established. On the very day of the opening an invoice of tea from Japan was shipped from San Francisco for St. Louis. The next day a telegram was received at the Post-office Department, Washington, from Promontory, stating that the mails had been delivered at that place for San Francisco. The cost of transmitting the mails by the Butterfield route was $1100 per mile by the year; by the railroad it is only $200 per mile. The transportation of troops, supplies and troops is diminished in the same ratio.

The advantages of the new route thus opened are obvious. Communication between China, Hong-Kong, and Liverpool will be measured by days instead of weeks. Facilities for the interchange of commodities will be the result of development of our national resources. Immigration will receive the aid of a most powerful auxiliary. What will grow out of the close connection thus established with Eastern Asia time alone can reveal. We are not disposed to be imaginative. Looking only to what is real and tangible, it is certain that no work of this century can compare in the grandeur both of the undertaking and of its probable results with the Pacific Railroad.

One of our illustrations on page 348 shows the interior of one of PULLMAN'S Palace Hotel Cars. These cars have all the accommodations of a first-class steamer—state-rooms with spring-beds, and made entirely of noiseless materials—being completely furnished. The passenger from Chicago to San Francisco will take a state-room, go to bed at night, and have breakfast, dinner, and supper on board the train while flying across the continent.

The other illustration on the same page shows the workmen—a medley of Irishmen and Chinamen—engaged in constructing the last line of the railroad. These are laying the stone road typify its significant result, bringing Europe and Asia fare to face, grasping hands across the American Continent.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY.

CHAPTER I.

"MY TIMID WORLD-FOLKS."

NEVER did a home stand so completely out of the world as the old Manor of Auriel, in Essex. Not only was it isolated from the din and bustle of towns, but its loneliness was enhanced even by those small attendant homesteads that usually cluster near a rich man's abode. A rich man gathers round him in some degree the social plants to the giant trunk which supports and nourishes their weak tendrils. Where the lord is all else must be content to exist in the village—there is a constant clatter at the anvil; the blacksmith's hand encircles the dainty heels of my lord's highly-bred steed; the buck, prancing with their well-groomed glossy faces, standing often cheek-by-jowl beside their stalwart brothers; the lady's maid has her shop and her available boys, with the inevitable sprig in their mouths, lounge against pillar and post, doing the hard for the benefit of girls, clowns. The butcher and the baker, the grocer and the carpenter, all have equal reasons to rejoice in my lord's occupation of Auriel. The back parts of

"And you are not so very old," she added, looking at him. "Not so old as father."

"Do you love your father?"

"Oh yes; and Topsa too."

There was silence again for a few seconds. Then he caught hold of the book in her hand and drew it toward the old-fashioned lattice to read the title.

"Can you read?" he asked, abruptly.

"I should rather think so."

"And what do you read?"

"The Arabian Nights, Clarissa Harlowe, Jack the Giant Killer, Hume's History of England, and the Latin Grammar."

"The Latin grammar! What a very odd little girl. You must be very wise."

"No, I am not," the child said, simply; "but I know my verbs."

"That's more than Conrad does."

"Who's Conrad?"

"My little boy."

"Have you any little girls?" Azalea asked, edging nearer to the barrel on which he had seated himself.

"Yes, two."

"Only two?"

"Only two." It was strange the difficulty he seemed to find in answering this last question: he hesitated, and as his eyes met hers he looked down at his boots.

She lifted up her violet eyes, and said, with a sort of subdued enthusiasm, "Oh, how I should like to see them!"

The stranger looked at her with tenderness. "So you shall," he said.

Again there was silence, for Azalea was lost in the reflections evoked by the nature of her new friend's last observation; and she stared out of the lattice panes in a sweet tumult of excitement. The occupant of the wooden cask looked at her thoughtfully. "I wish they were like her," he muttered; "so high-bred in appearance—so pretty!"

The sun was sinking in intensely red streaks behind a grove of firs opposite the window. A faint reflex of its glow suffused the ragged-looking room, and cast down warm lights on Azalea's flaxen head and on the mound of gold-chinked apples heaped near the eastern wall. The faint, sweet smell of the fruit, the flutter of the birds in the eaves, the warm gusts of air that came in through the broken panes—all breathed of peace and wealth; not of the wealth of art, but that of Nature.

He who sat watching little Azalea with such a wistful sadness in his gray-blue eyes had spent the previous day in a house where the wealth of art predominated. In his London home the rooms were furnished with gorgeous sofas and heavy curtains; exquisitely painted pictures hung on his walls, and marble statues were caused to throw shadowy nooks of his broad staircases. He possessed rare similitudes of Flemish faces and fruit, painted by clever Dutchmen, but the living flowers that stood by the windows were shriveled and limp-looking; the ivy that was planted in the grate rippled up the outer wall in a dingy-looking streak of green. Here, round this roughly-shaped chamber, Nature reveled in her exuberance. She poured forth sweet scents from the dew-heavy roses below. The ivy, thick with foliage, threw out hundreds of light green tendrils to clamber over the darker mass of green beneath; the birds built their nests in the securely-twisted branches, while the twigs offered a secure footing to numberless young swallows, who sat on them in puffy imbecility.

Some of the ivy tendrils had forced their way into the room, and had conferred grace on the uneven boards and cobwebbed walls; outside the window the eye roved over rich undulations of variously-colored foliage: the deep red of the beech, the wan yellow of the limes, contrasted well with glossy, stolid-looking chestnuts, and firs and delicate masses of oak leaves. Far off, where the soft fringes of the woodland melted into the warmer gloom of the horizon, a church spire was dimly visible, and the deep tones of its bell began to toll the hour of seven. The stranger drew near the window, and looked wistfully out at the dying day.

"What do you see?" Azalea asked, curiously, as she caught sight of the intent face he was turning westward.

Had he answered truly he would have said, "I see the gleam of a broad river begin to widen among these dense thickets. I see a gray bridge, and a drooping willow. The red sun is flushing the water instead of these wooly gloams. By the stream's verge I watch for the flutter of a little gray shawl, and then I feel that I shall see the glow that deepens on the sweetest face that ever man loved."

As it was, he turned his grave eyes on the child, and gave her what she mentally stigmatized as a crooked answer.

"Do you ever go to church?"

"Yes; often."

"Do you like it?"

"Yes; there's a sermon on afternoons; father goes to sleep, and I sit and watch the figures. There's a man in armor kneeling on a cushion, and a woman in a stiff collar at the other end: there are six children in stiff collars kneeling by their side; the children have got their mouths open like little birds gaping for worms. Underneath there are some verses, which say they're all gone to heaven. I used to hope that when they got there some one would undo the collars for them—they looked so choked. I wish," the child added, coming nearer to him, "that if you know any thing about it you would tell me, is it such a puzzle to me."

"What is a puzzle?"

"What we are up there," pointing to the sky. "Will the birds near their feathers? Will the squirrels run up trees? Will the dear little foxes burrow their sharp noses without being troubled by the dogs barking at their tails?"

"Hush, hush! you mustn't talk so: there won't be any animals there; and don't call a fox's tail a tail—call it a brush."

He was a sound Christian, and a good sportsman, and he was shocked by such unconventional remarks.

"Then you think when I die I shall never see Topsa any more?" the child said, in a melancholy voice.

"No; but you'll see every one else: all the human beings that have ever died will wear the bright form of spirits."

"But I shall care about any one else except—my father," the child said, ruefully. "To be sure," she added, with a gleam of satisfaction, "I shall see the little gray shawl and girl, and perhaps they will be pleased to see me as I've looked at them so long."

The stranger was inexpressibly touched. "My poor darling," he began; but he was arrested both in his speech and in the caress he was about to give the flaxen head, for George Moore's voice was heard below.

"Azalea, Issa, come down; it's time to go home to tea. I've beaten down all the 'cops in wine,' and to-morrow we'll pick them up."

"There's father," Azalea said, her little face lighting up. She descended swiftly, and mounting George at the foot of the steps began a hurried account of the new visitor, in which the only coherent sentence was, "And he has promised I shall see his little girls."

George Moore listened with wonder, mixed with a vague sensation of alarm: "Who is it? who is it, d'ye say, Azalea?" he asked. The stranger had descended the steps, and now advanced in time to answer the question.

"You have forgotten me, I see, Moore," he said, kindly.

The old gardener turned pale at the sound of the voice—at the sight of the clear-cut face.

"Good Lord! is it really you, Mr. Francis? My lord, I mean. Oh, Sir! what a start you have given me!"

Then, with a deeper agitation in his voice, the old man pointed to the child, who flitted swiftly before them as they turned to go to the house.

"You are—are—one of—of—her, Sir, are going to take her from me, are you, Mr. Francis? I love her so, and she is like my own child to me. She makes old age easier to me, and I think she loves me."

"Yes, I think she does," the younger man said, with a slight tremor in his voice as he spoke—then he added, gently, "Be easy, Moore; I would only take her for a very little while. She will never leave you while you live, unless she herself wishes it."

"Take her for a very little while," Moore echoed, in astonishment; "what would Lady Orme say?"

"Lady Orme is dead," his companion answered, gravely.

"Tea is ready, father," said a childish treble at his knee. Both men started and smiled, as, on looking down, they saw a flaxen head bowing the shadow between them, and each felt a little hand slipped in its entrance.

"You shall both lend me home," she said, graciously. And accordingly all three entered the Auriel door together.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE Legislature of Pennsylvania has passed an act imposing a penalty of $25 for killing any insectivorous bird, one-half the fine to be paid to the informer. Most of the small birds generally seen in this latitude are classed under the head of insectivorous birds.

Only a few years ago a June promenade through many of our shady streets and parks was made extremely disagreeable by the spinning inch-worms which dropped down upon garments and upon one's own person with most uncomfortable familiarity. This nuisance is now almost entirely abated—a circumstance doubtless due, in part, to the precautions which has been extended in our city to sparrows and other birds.

The value of birds as insect-exterminators can scarcely be overestimated; indeed they are indispensable to successful gardening in many parts of Switzerland, Germany, and other European states, the protection of birds is a subject of strict legislation. That there is need of laws on the subject figures will show. According to official statements there were gathered and delivered to the authorities of the canton of Berne, during 1864 and 1865, about 36,000 imperial bushels of May-bugs, and 40,000 bushels of canker-worms! The number of chafers thus collected was estimated at 625,000,000; the number of canker-worms 1,875,150,000. Had these insects lived they would have increased thirtyfold by the spring of 1867, or to 68,000,000,000. When it is considered that a single canker-worm during its existence from the egg to its change into a chrysalis eats two pounds of vegetable matter, it follows that, had not the authorities taken such active measures, the entire harvest of the canton would have been consumed by them in the year 1867. A German agricultural paper, by a series of nice but sensible calculations, estimates that a single family of seven members will consume in a summer not less than 576,000 injurious insects; and that if 100 pairs of swallows make their nests in a village these birds and their descendants will, in the course of a single summer, eat over 57,000,000 of insects.

The last intelligence received from Dr. Livingstone, the African traveler, was of date December 14, 1867, at which time he was at Casembe, seven hundred miles from Zanzibar, since which no reliable information has been received concerning him; but he is believed to be alive and well.

The gentler sex are going to extreme lengths in Paris! A duel is reported to have come off between a lady and a gentleman. M. d'Arevilly, theatrical critic of the Nain Jaune, having said something which displeased Mademoiselle Duverger, an actress at the Gaité, that lady called him out, and the duel came off on Sunday afternoon at St. Germain. Mademoiselle Duverger chose pistols, and at the first shot succeeded in carrying off one of the locks of hair which adorned her opponent's head. Her second—two actresses from the same theatre—then declared honor satisfied, and the party wound up the day by a dinner at the Pavillon Henri IV.

The "Pacific," one of the Erie Railway Drawing-room Coaches, is a most luxurious affair. It is sixty-eight feet long, and divided into ten compartments. Each compartment is lighted by large plate-glass windows; the upholstery is of the richest crimson plush: the wood-work elegantly carved and inlaid; and nothing seems wanting to insure comfort and luxury. An entire apartment of eight seats may be rented from New York to Buffalo for $75, in addition to the ordinary fare; an apartment for four persons for $6, or a single seat for $1.50.

Queen Isabella has made her appearance in a Paris court as plaintiff against an aged Baroness. Isabella, it seems, agreed to hire two houses of the Baroness, on condition that certain alterations were made at a given time. The alterations, however, were not completed at the promised time, and the ex-Queen gave up her lease. But she had paid in advance half a year's rent. The Court decided that this should be restored to her, but that Isabella should pay the Baroness ten thousand francs for alterations made in anticipation of her inhabiting the houses.

There is a prospect that some of the baggage belonging to travelers will be saved from total wreck. The Legislature of Massachusetts have had a bill before it to the effect that any baggage-master, expressagent, backman, or other person whose duty it is to handle baggage, who shall wantonly injure it while in their charge shall be punished by a fine not exceeding fifty dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding two months. Such a law, if strictly enforced, would be a saving of trunks and tempers. Other States would do well follow the example of Massachusetts.

The first publication Japan has sent forth expressly for foreign readers is a literary curiosity. It is a pamphlet, printed in the form of Japanese wood-cuts on China paper, representing the successive and varied experiences of a traveler, in the most graphic and quaint way; with an explanation of each sentence in English. It is published in Yokohama, and a few copies of the edition have been imported, and may be seen by the curious at the book-store of G. P. Putnam & Co.

A terrible hail-storm lately occurred in Union County, Illinois. The ground was in some places covered two feet deep. The hail-stones measured from one to two and a half inches in diameter, and some were found as large as a man's fist. The damage to fruit was very great, particularly to strawberries and peaches.

A young girl in Boston has originated a very pleasant charity. At her suggestion the chapel of one of the central churches is opened two mornings in the week for the reception of fresh fruits and flowers, which are to be distributed among the poor of the city who are on beds of suffering. These gifts will bring joy to many weary hearts.

During the past year the "Home" under the supervision of the American Female Guardian Society has sheltered 207 adults and 68 children. Eight infants have been placed by the Society in homes elsewhere, and 199 adults have been assisted to situations in families. There are nine industrial schools in the care of this Society, having an average attendance of 1300 children.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

SENIOR WRANGLERS—Quarrelsome Old Men.

What inanimate objects show a dislike to solitude? —Velocipedes: because they'll never travel without somebody.

THE "PARTS" OF SPEECH—S, p, e, c, h.

A novelty has been introduced at social parties in Paris. At the entrance of the saloon is placed a large flower basket containing small bouquets of flowers. Each guest plunges his or her hand into the basket and takes a bouquet, which the ladies attach to their dress or put in their hair, and the gentlemen place in their buttonhole. The latter promenade through the saloons, each in search of a lady wearing a similar bouquet to their own; and when she is found he has a right to take possession of her and retain her as a partner. If the gentleman does not find the lady he finds her, or half a dozen, with similar bouquets, is not regarded—or are the bouquets carefully made in couples?

YOUNG LADY (to Fred, with Rain coming on.) "Fred, I always manage to get caught. I know when I'm born, by the eye on you that you was brave to rashness."

FRED (cowering up smiling.) "Oh don't, my dear! Why do you say that?"

YOUNG LADY. "Why, any man must have courage who can trust himself long at a time on such legs as yours."

ILLEGAL HUSBANDRY—Thrashing a wife.

"Wife! why in the name of goodness did you not make the washer-woman put starch in my shirt-collar?" "Why, my dear," said the wife, "I thought it a useless waste of the article, for I can get your choler up so easily without it."

FRACTIONAL CURRENCY.

A PUZZLE.

Twice ten are six of us,
Six are all but three of us,
Nine are but four of us.
What can we possibly be?
Would you know more of us?
I'll tell you more of us:
Twelve are but six of us,
Five are but four of us.

Ans.—The number of letters contained in each numeral.

Velocipedes are expensive. A gentleman in a certain town of Northern New York recently bought a bicycle which he paid $100: broke a plate-glass window, for which he paid $40; cut his face and neck, for which he paid the doctor $8; ruined one pair of pantaloons, for which he paid $11: frightened a horse so that the animal run away and broke a buggy for which he paid damages amounting to $60: and, finally, smashed his velocipede by running against a wall, leaving him $76 out of pocket and a court-plaster bed to show for it.

Josh Billings says:

"I honestly believe it is better tew know nothing than tew know what ain't so.

"Doing tew much is like skinning a new milch cow for the milk, giving the next tew the bawbee.

"When you hain't got nothing tew do, do it at once: that is the best time to be idle.

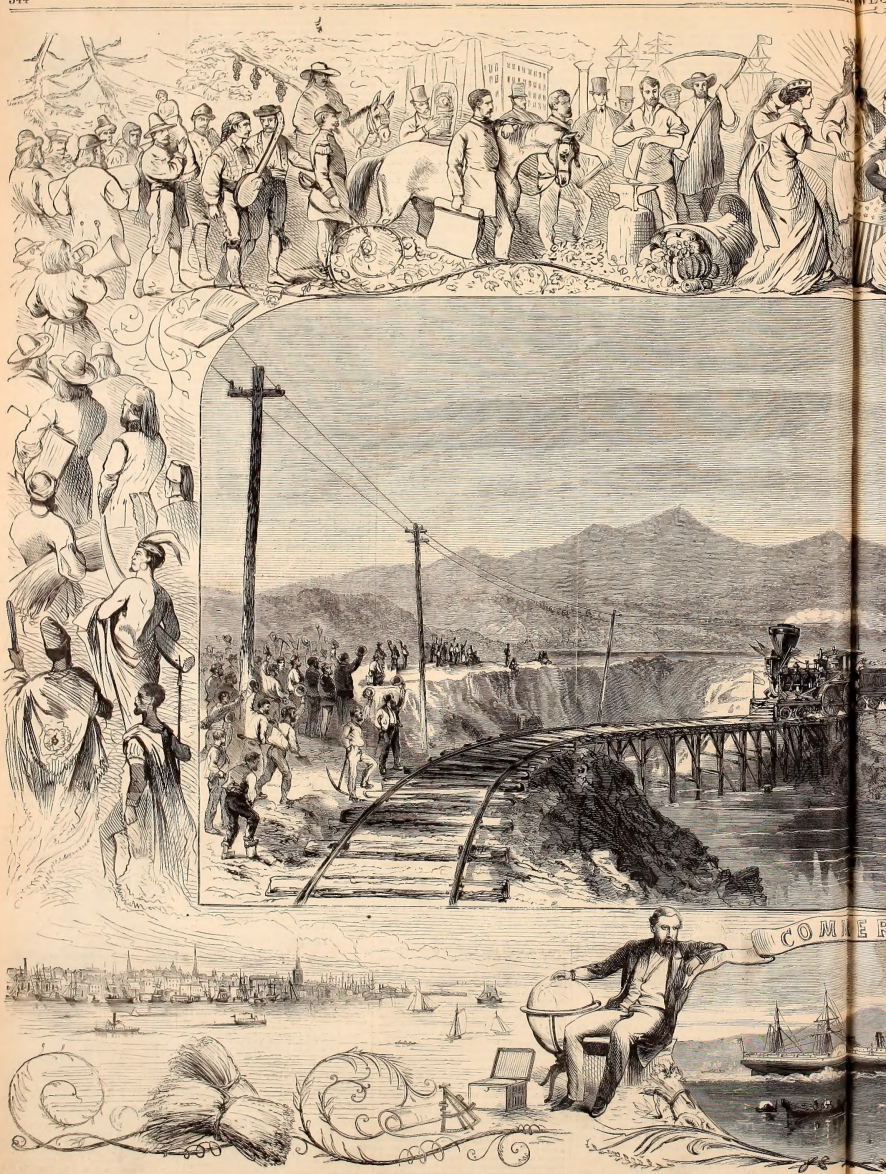
"Never be a man known, for the more he will guess at; and guessing is a thousand times than worse.

"Living on hope is like living on wind. A good way tew git plump, but a poor way tew git about.

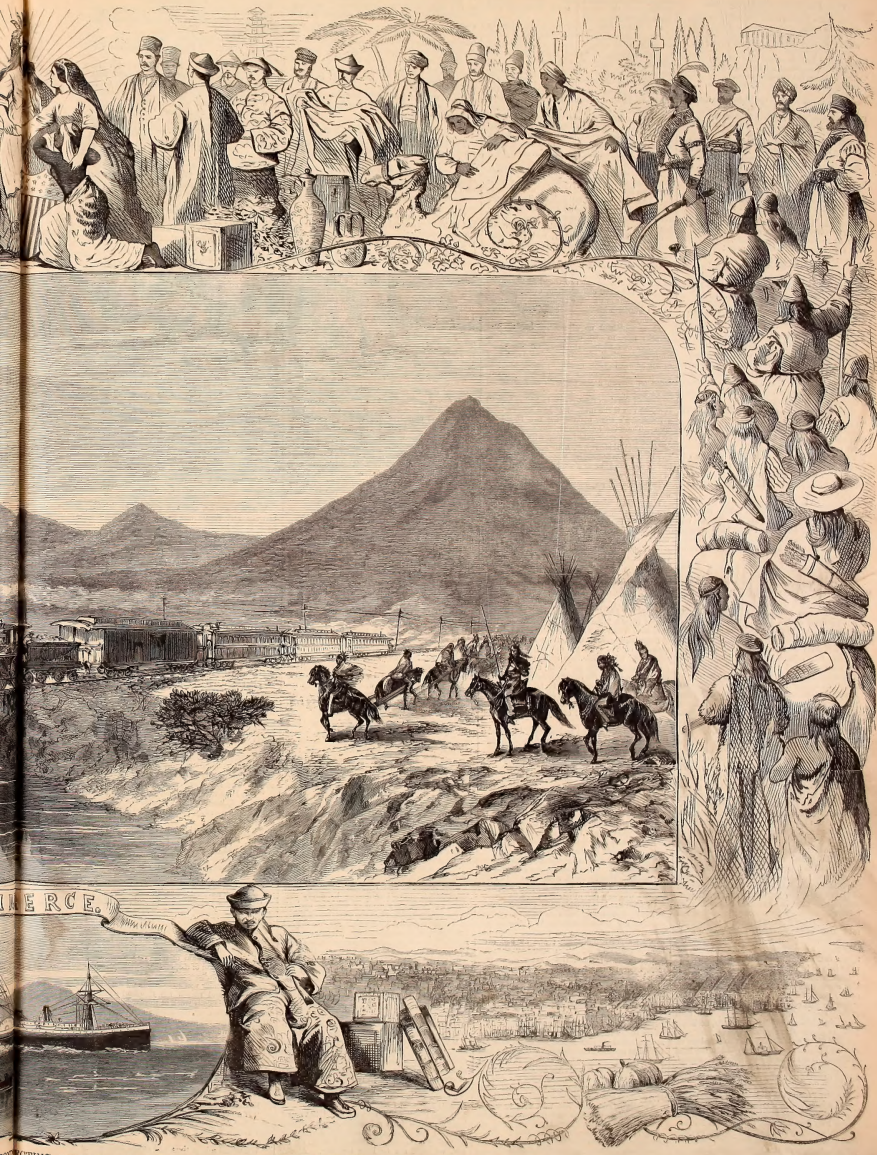
THE COLORED SOROSIS.

"MRS. O'FLARTY takes the Chair, and Mr. O'Flarty has the Floor!"

"There goes Mrs. Boggs to the Convention with my new pair of Pants. Now I'll have to stay Home with the Baby any how."



COMPLETION OF THE PACIFIC RAILROAD, MAY 10, 1869.—THE GREAT LINK CONNECTING



NECTING EUROPE WITH ASIA ACROSS THE AMERICAN CONTINENT.—[See Page 341.]

UNDER THE CHESTNUTS.

FALL the white blossoms, the soft turf is glowing,
Rustle the tender green ferns in a row:
Under the chestnuts it seems to be snowing,
While the grand leafy boughs sway to and fro.

Glints on the mill-stream the silvering glory
Of the full tender-eyed Queen of the night;
Telling to lovers the ever-same story,
Telling how dew-drops the lily-cups white.

Hushed are the moorlands: the nightingale keepeth
Vigil alone, as he plaintively sings;
Under the ferns every gray rabbit sleepeth,
Moonlight for peasants, and peasants are kings.

Through the tall chestnuts the night-breeze is straying,
Kissing their leaves and their pyramids white;
Through the long chestnuts the sephyrs are playing,
Sporting like brownies and fays in the night.

Under the chestnuts we wandered a-dreaming,
True friends, and lovers, in years long ago;
Each come those solemn to-night, each is gleaming,
Boyhood has come again;—would it were so!

And yet I know not—for why should we, weeping,
Sigh for the past, that can ne'er come again?
Better by far to let memory, sleeping,
Lie unawakened, nor murmur in vain!

Mlle. Euphrosine's Thursdays.

BY MISS DE BETHAM-EDWARDS.

AUTHOR OF "DOCTOR JACOB," "KITTY," ETC., ETC.

I.—THE FIRST THURSDAY.

We were four medical students in Paris.

The elder, Alcek M'Kraw, was a Scotchman next come Sebastian Krebs, whose patronymic bespeaks his German origin; the third in the category was Tom Lightfoot, a Londoner; a gifted young Italian named Joseph Portromoly, completed the quartette.

More than one tie bound us together in a sort of brotherhood.

There was our poverty to begin with. We were almost as poor as Victor Hugo's hero who made a mutton chop do duty for three dinners. We were all young, all enthusiastic votaries of Æsculapius, all fond of pleasure, and we were all in love with the same woman. The beginning of our love-story is the beginning of my narrative.

It happened in this wise:

There were two professional ladies, relatives of Portromoly, to whose weekly réunions we were always welcome, and as we liked society and got very little of it, we seldom failed to present ourselves at the modest salon of Mademoiselle Euphrosine.

Mademoiselle Euphrosine, the youngest of the two sisters was the leading spirit of the little coterie, was no longer young. Of a woman's age who may dare to speak? Suffice it to say, that in losing her youth she had not lost her charms, and that if she wanted declared lovers, she could count admirers by the dozen. She was, moreover, a siren by right of musical gifts. She sang and played our hearts away night after night. There was this inexpressible consolation, that as our siren was neither young nor beautiful, we were not constrained to stop our ears with wax.

Mademoiselle Antoinette, the elder sister, fascinated us by her intellect and conversational powers. A diplomée professor of literature, she prided herself upon being able to converse aládies' with this or that distinguished author in the field of politics, belles-lettres, or social science. Mademoiselle Euphrosine, by comparison with her sister Mademoiselle Antoinette, was beautiful.

The weekly receptions, though each was a decidedly accurate copy of the other, did not tire us. Music, conversation, dominos, whist, and tea, followed each other in unvarying succession, and there was so little variety among the guests that a fresh arrival was looked upon as an event.

With one such event our history opens. One evening we entered Mademoiselle Euphrosine's salon to find every thing as completely transformed as if a magician's wand had been at work there. Our two hostesses were in their usual places and surrounded by their usual satellites: the scientific siren, Mademoiselle Euphrosine, dressed in a girlish costume of white muslin and pink rose-buds, sat at the piano. Over her head Professor Lagueuse, the only decided of her adorers, a stout, sentimental gentleman, who may be described as one of those unknown celebrities of a mournfully met with in artistic and literary society. In close proximity to these two sat another of Mademoiselle Euphrosine's admirers, a popular painter, named Renneval. He also boasted a prosperous looking rotundity of figure, that argued well for a profession not unlikely held to be lucrative.

Mademoiselle Antoinette occupied the sofa. Her appearance contrasted strikingly with that of her sister, for she wore the same rusty gut ments on gala occasions and in the professional chair. Her hair went its own way. No such womanly vanities as white wristbands, neck-ribbons, or gloves were ever indulged in.

Chief of her worshipers were two members of the legal profession: what they did in the legal profession is not necessary to know. It is enough to say that they both had "a lean and hungry look," betitling men who are supposed "to think too much."

Gathered round the table were the usual whist and domino players, a group of ladies and gentlemen who, having nothing to do with my narrative, may be described en masse as literary, artistic, amiable, and gifted with the enviable faculty of ever growing loud when talking.

Such, then, was the usual mise-en-scène of Mademoiselle Euphrosine's Thursdays. But where was the magician whose wand had metamorphosed the familiar scene to us on this particular night, so that we stood transfixed with joy and bewilderment?

In a remote corner of the room, unnoticed by the rest of the company, sat a young girl of about seventeen years of age. She was dressed in an ill-made school-girl's frock of blue stuff, and was turning over photographs with the air of a child who is told to amuse itself and be good, hardly looking up on our entrance. But her face was in no sweet and that it needed no wonderful the others could for a moment ignore her presence. Her complexion was that of a delicate pea-hen, now, her eyes small and vivacious, her nose, not classic certainly, but the prettiest imaginable; her eyes large and of a delicious blue, nearly dreamy, unfathomable; and, to crown all, she had the gold-brown hair that poets love and painters adore.

All four of us were bewitched, and in a breath demanded of Mademoiselle Euphrosine the favor of an introduction.

"An introduction to my little pupil and niece, Theresine Romano?" Certainly, Messieurs; but she is a school-girl at present, and speaks hardly ten words of French. Therefore, mon enfant, Messieurs Krebs, Portromoly, and Lightfoot, voilà Monsieur Fontremoly is your fellow-countryman."

Fontremoly's eyes sparkled with conscious triumph, and he seated himself at the young girl's side. In a moment or two they had fallen into an easy, animated conversation, every word of which was lost to us. We were sorry, for once out of humor with Mademoiselle Euphrosine's Thursdays.

There remained no alternative but to bear unlucky fate, to play dominos with the obese bachelors and widows, to hang over the piano while Mademoiselle Euphrosine played and sang to her adorer in rusty brown, to partake of Mademoiselle Antoinette's tea, and listen to her tirades on Fourierism, with as little ennui as we might.

And all the time Pontremoly looked so happy! It seemed as if the musical Tuscan tongue were a freemason's sign, making the two friends at once. Theresine looked like Pontremoly's sister, certainly; their eyes beamed with reciprocated interest; their voices, both very sweet, kept up a duet of never-flagging talk; their attention to each other made us as if we had been hundreds of miles away.

The hours till sugar-water, wine, and biscuits were handed round, and the party broke up.

We walked along the Boulevards moodily. For the first time we had the courage to say to each other about the evening's amusement; formerly it had been how well So-and-So had played the Le Rêve-Elève. Krebs threw himself on the sofa, with an unusual expression of face, half troubled, half joyful. Pontremoly had his cigarette-case in his hand long after more than the others, and I regarded him in the light of a young and petted brother.

"Is she not an angel to look at?" he asked; "and an angel she is. Yet, do you know, Lightfoot, I almost wish I had never been here."

"Never see her again," I cried. "The remedy is in your own hands."

"I am not joking," Pontremoly added, smiling his own wayward, winning smile; "and I do not mind telling my strange fancies to you, for you respect them. Well, then, I wish I had not been so sure that Mademoiselle Euphrosine's niece is my Fate as I am of my own existence."

"My dear fellow, I wish you every pretty face is a man's fate by turns. Remember Adrienne; remember Emilie."

"Oh! what have they in common with Theresine?" he said. "But wait for the evidence of my words. It may come to-morrow. It may come ten years hence. But it surely will, and the day will be a day of fate for us all."

Of what use is it to contradict a Scotchman or a Tuscan? Fontremoly has ever been the spoiled child of our little fraternity, by virtue of his sweet, impulsive temper, his enthusiasm, and his happy way of doing things; and he had ever been a riddle to us. The strangest theories floated through his brain upon every social and metaphysical question. To-day he would be deep in Fourierism; to-morrow in the Hegelian philosophy; then he was a chameleon, consistent only in his inconsistency.

From that day Mademoiselle Euphrosine's Thursdays became the turning-point in our existence. Krebs, Alcek, and myself betook ourselves to the study of Italian, in which Pontremoly assisted us with the zeal of a martyr to attribute to excessive confidence. Without a doubt he imagined Theresine to have fallen in love with him. She did not, as we all set out on the same race: and if Pontremoly were the swiftest runner there was always the chance that some stone might trip him up.

Certainly Theresine was very kind to us all. She was of so childlike and caressing a nature that it seemed impossible to her to pain any one of us by a slight, however unintentional. Without the slightest coquetry she showered her sweetest smiles and words so impartially that it would have been impossible for an outsider to guess at the most favored lover. Krebs and myself declared to each other that we were frantically in love; at the same time we acknowledged, sub rosâ, Pontremoly's chances to be immeasurably the greater.

Alcek alone maintained an icy silence as to his feelings. He sat up till midnight poring over our Italian exercises and phrase-book. He dined off bread and soupe maigre every Thursday, in order to buy Theresine a bouquet. He pawned his dearly loved skeleton for the sake of buying a dress-coat.

Alcek was the least popular among us; but we felt bound to acknowledge that he, if any one, deserved to carry off the prize.

II.—THE SECOND THURSDAY.

THURSDAY succeeded Thursday, bringing its portion of joy or disappointment to each of us. Pontremoly and I, Theresine smiled upon Krebs—stout, jolly, spectacled Krebs—he became a person the gods might envy. Therefore Alcek withheld a kind word from myself, I declared my cup of wretchedness to be full to the brim, and my comrades believed me.

We had all mustered a little Italian now, and as Theresine could speak charming broken French, Pontremoly's supremacy was at an end. Wayward in all things, he was equally wayward in love-making. What would have disconcerted most lovers was a source of satisfaction to him, and instead of resenting the advantages we had already gained, he positively put others in our way.

"He wishes to give us all fair play," Alcek said more than once, smiling bitterly; Krebs and I had worshiped the fact with a better grace than the Scotchman.

We were now in the month of June, and one Thursday Mademoiselle Euphrosine invited us to spend the afternoon with her party in the Bois de Boulogne, instead of giving the usual reception.

To a set of poor, hard-working, friendless students like ourselves, a gala day had always come to us but rarely in our lives. In the society of Theresine seemed too good to be true. We dressed ourselves à l'Anglaise, with straw hats, and dressed our button-hole, and set off to the rendezvous in great exhilaration.

The day was superb. Mademoiselle Euphrosine's toilet was the delight of all her visitors excepting Theresine's lovers. She looked—at a distance—like a shepherdess on a pastoral fan; close, she looked like her broad-brimmed straw hat trimmed with rose-buds, her fanciful blue bodice, and long white skirt bordered with blue. For her arm she carried a dainty scarf matching the dress, and in one hand a tiny parasol. What she wanted in freshness she made up by art.

Alcek. No wonder Monsieur Laguesse was in a seventh heaven.

And Theresine? She needed no superficial allurements of the milliner, looking in her cheap blue gown and old-fashioned brown hat as lovely as the Madonna della Sedia, Raphael and Murillo. Her bright, gold-brown hair hung curling in childish fashion about her neck; her sweet mouth smiled its celestial smile; her large, dreamy eyes looked bluer, more pathetic than ever.

For an hour or two we wandered among the green alleys, then drove to a little restaurant on the borders of the fairy-like little lake southward of the Bois, and partook of ices. Monsieur Laguesse announced that the gentlemen should treat the ladies to a row, and though such an act of gallantry was sure to entail the sacrifice of a dinner or breakfast, we hailed the proposal eagerly.

Mademoiselle Euphrosine divided the party wisely, arranging Theresine to the care of Alcek and myself, requiring Pontremoly and Krebs as cavaliers to two of the younger young ladies of the party. Lightfoot must be left out, that we were less entertaining than our Italian and German comrades, so that we were indebted to the privilege for a sense of our inferiority. But Pontremoly, for the first time, acted like a jealous lover. "It is a veil, Alcek has stolen my heart!" he answered himself of the Scotchman's seat beside Theresine, seized the oar, and put off.

Alcek turned deadly white, and holding up his hat, shook it in Pontremoly's face. Pontremoly only laughed defiance, and as the boat glided away shouted, in a mocking voice, "I give you my next chance!"

"You shall pay the price of this first!" shouted back Alcek in his wrath.

Then we saw him deprecate Mademoiselle Euphrosine's suave interference by angry gestures, and when we got out on the opposite side to the others, stride off in the direction of Paris. Theresine reproved Pontremoly for his unkind behavior to our friend, Pontremoly took it very lightly, and was in the most extravagant spirits all the afternoon. He sang, he laughed, he imitated Lightfoot's walk, he mimicked and parodied alternately. When we joined the others I noticed that he fell back with Theresine, and while I jested continually, he replied in a low, trembling tones. I fancied I heard the sound of sobs. Pontremoly looked pale and agitated after the adieux were made, and taking hold of my arm, proposed that we should leave Krebs to follow Alcek with the carriage and home together.

"What a fool that good Alcek must be," he said, "to think that his passion or his rage can touch Theresine and Euphrosine! Ah, Lightfoot, Lightfoot, and a person to be trusted; of course, it's as plain as daylight how matters stand between her and me."

I could not deny that he appeared Theresine's favored love, and I said so.

"That's well said," he went on; "but now I have a strange thing to confide to you. Something—I know not what—tells me that Therese and the slighted Alcek will be married, and for her, we shall not be long together. Alcek's chance will come then." He broke into a wild laugh, adding: "Let him use it as best he may. But now I want to talk to you of ourselves. I shall soon have to leave Theresine."

I answered him lightly, taking this new thought as only the thousandth of nine hundred and ninety-nine vagaries.

"Turn philosopher ere it may be too late, my friend," I said. "There is no time like the present."

"What business have we to talk of time?" he said. "Time is but the succession of such events as are assigned to us. Therefore is it that my spirit can live always, though in the flesh we may be divided next week, say, to-morrow?"

"On my word, I answered, "you make light of lovers' partings. Come, now, confess that you will not be very melancholy, very lachrymose!"

"Jest at me, mock me as you will," he added, coldly; "the time for jesting is short. Did I not tell you that my fate was coming, Lightfoot? When it comes, you will jest no more."

Then he left me. We had strolled together the length of the Avenue des Champs Elysées, and paused on the Place de Concorde. Fontremoly entered the Tuileries gardens, bound homeward—we lived on the Quai St. Michel—and I turned into the Rue de Rivoli.

But I had hardly walked a dozen yards before a hand was laid upon my shoulder, and a familiar voice called my name.

It was Pontremoly.

"I did not mean to part from you in anger, just now," he said, "and I want to say something to you for once and for all that has been on my mind for a long time. Will you promise me that what I say to you, and the true friend to her whatever happens?"

I would have answered him lightly, but his look forbade it. Grasping his hand firmly, I gave the promise. Then he thanked me with a satisfied, though melancholy, smile, and we started.

I fancied him over the street—graceful as a fawn, beautiful as an Apollo—with mixed feelings of envy and admiration. How my limping and gifted friend must! How women loved him! Yet something told me that his lot was not a lot to covet.

I sat up working till midnight, but Pontremoly did not return. A vague feeling of uneasiness took possession of me. Had the two rivals met to quarrel afresh? Had Alcek struck in our fierce blow in unconsidered haste? Pontremoly possessed a sword, broken by fencer? All these misgivings crossed my mind as I lay wakeful till the morning dawned.

III.—THE MYSTERY.

WHEN I awoke, the sun stood high in the heavens, and Krebs was by my bedside with a letter in his hand.

"Now for the great and inscrutable mystery," he said. "Portromoly has gone—gone home, and this now was left at the house-door early, and will, doubtless, explain every thing."

I rubbed my eyes and turned over the missive inquisitively.

"Don't keep a fellow in suspense," Krebs cried, with impatience, "for I think if it proves a mere case of elopement after all?"

Then I tore open the envelope and read the following, written in a hand deliberately in Pontremoly's effeminate hand:

"I follow the beckoning finger of Fate without looking back. Remember your promise, and be a brother to Theresine."

For a moment we looked into each other's eyes in blank amazement. Then all broke into one cry of horrified dismay.

"Barmherziger Gott!" exclaimed Krebs, turning pale. "The poor fool has not committed suicide?"

"What motive should he have for such a deed?" I said, trembling with undefined apprehension.

"None, except madness," Krebs answered, wiping the drops of perspiration from his brow. "And Pontremoly has always seemed half mad to me. But let us hear what Alcek has to say."

"Am I the madman's keeper?" an angry voice; and, looking up, we beheld Alcek, who stood in the doorway, paler and more aghast than ourselves.

"You don't think I've murdered him, do you?" he said, laughing grimly.

There was a somewhat awkward pause. At last Krebs asked, quite naturally, whether Alcek and Pontremoly had fought on the previous night.

Alcek glared angrily from one to the other of us, and then, with impatient haste, replied:

"Of course I should have fought him, had he given me the chance, and perhaps murdered him in the bargain," he said, "for I am clearly kept out of my way. You may look incredulous, Lightfoot; you may stare, Krebs: that is my reading of the case. Pontremoly is the favored one by right of Fate. He was afraid of me," and then Alcek laughed—"afraid of me, and not, perhaps, without cause for fear."

Alcek's manner was so excited and suspicious that Krebs and myself for the thankful when he went off to his daily work at the Sorbonne. We wanted to talk over the matter of Pontremoly's disappearance calmly and dispassionately, and we could we do it with Alcek present in such a mood?

"Of course," Alcek is as innocent of any harm to our comrade as myself," Krebs said, addressing, with a grimace, "though I wouldn't stand in his shoes for something if Pontremoly never turns up."

"He will not be suspected?" I said."

Krebs shrugged his shoulders.

"If a man disappears somebody must be suspected of foul play, and who so likely as the person known to have threatened him the day before?"

We talked a long time, and at last came to the conclusion that, if Pontremoly did not appear in a week's time, we would hand over his letters, keys, etc., to the police. Of our consternation, as day succeeded day—of our confidence in to-morrow's chance—of our blind hopes—of our still blinder solutions of the mystery—I need not speak. All our fellow-participators in the delights of Mademoiselle Euphrosine's Thursdays took part in our agonies and sorrow. By their advice, the facts of the case were laid before a commissary of the police, and Alick was subjected to a judicial examination that was anything but agreeable. Pontremoly, however, not to be outdone, had how was Alick to be proved innocent?

For several days our quiet little apartments were deranged by numerous inquisitive looking gens d'armes, who peered into every corner, and almost took us all into custody because we could not manufacture people.

During this unhappy time, Alick's conduct was most extraordinary. No vestige of evidence marked him as guilty of any thing beyond the shaken fist and the muttered threat in the Bois de Boulogne. These alike proofs and probability came to a stand-still, since there was nothing to show that the rivals had met again. But Alick's attitude was willfully, persistently that of a conscience-smitten man. He seemed to take a weird delight in the mesh of suspicious circumstances in which he found himself. He would so improve upon the evidence against him, that there were times when Krebs and myself trembled, as if indeed we were in the presence of a murderer. Gloom, discomfort, incessant mood, or—to put the thing into plain words—suspicion, however much we might try to conceal it, filled the whole establishment. Laying hold on some chain of circumstantial evidence, other than those which existed, he would force us to follow him through labyrinthine thickets of guilt and darkness till we came to the full light of the horrible truth, which with a grim chuckle of satisfaction—"Don't you see it?" he would cry, looking from one to the other. "It must be I! And no one else!"—invariably builders the crime of Pontremoly's disappearance rests."

For a time our peaceful little monsarde became a very den of discord. One monomaniac idea turned upon us for slighting or insulting him; the next, for being too kind to a wretch who would have done us all to death in his dying day.

But here the influence of Mademoiselle Euphrosine's Thursdays came like balm—healing, soothing, mercy. Her sisters really wearied the loins of Thursday, most gifted, and most beautiful guest—for, as I have before said, Pontremoly had a face of a young god—moreover, they felt much for the misery that had befallen his boon companions. Accordingly, we were feted and petted like convalescent children or prodigal sons. Each succeeding Thursday was made, in some sort, a surprise by means of new sweets or new amusements. Mademoiselle Euphrosine borrowed novels for us without number; Mademoiselle Antoinette invited us to thés-à-fre invariably on Wednesdays. Under this kindly feminine influence Krebs and myself gradually recovered our spirits, while Alick recovered his sanity. And therewith—

Her conduct was even more inexplicable than that of Alick, since it did not change. She had never been gay and sad by turns—one to-day, the other to-morrow; changeful as the winds and seas, it was always doubtful in which mood we should find her. But she was an incomparable actress, or Pontremoly's disappearance affected her less than it did any of us. She talked of him to all of us in a strain of mingled enthusiasm and triumph. She even entered into the never-ending discussions upon the mystery without apparent flinching. Had she any heart, this young Southerner, with her enchanting smiles and charming ways? Did she ask an answer to despair under the semblance of unconcern? Was she privy to this terrible silence? Was she a traitor to him, or to us all?

I had made many overtures of friendliness, in compliance with my poor friend's request, but met with evident coldness. Sometimes would deprecate the proffered service with a smile or a sophism. Again and again I endeavored to follow the sacred trend to me, again and again to fail. At last my patience gave way, and I spoke out.

It happened one evening that I found myself alone on the sofa with Theresine. The rest of the party were engaged in a loud and animated social discussion. There was no fear of our conversation being overheard.

"Mademoiselle," I said, in Italian, "I am not to see you so gay. Pontremoly was a near lover—yet you smile, you sing, you dance! Must I believe that you are heartless? Must I believe that, without guilt, you can torture? Pardon me, mademoiselle, if, as the friend deputed by Pontremoly to watch over you, I speak out the thought of my heart, though all the while I must give you pain."

She looked me with all the pathos of her sweet eyes, her lips trembled, her dimpled cheeks grew pale; and, bending low, she whispered with apparent effort:

"Oh! monsieur, do not judge me yet. Have patience: trust me a little longer. I am indeed not to him."

"And have you any hope?" I asked.

"How can I despair?" she said. "If he were dead, I know I should die; but I could not dwell apart from mine. He believed that too."

"You will be happy till then?" I said, for the time possessed by the young girl's strange fancy.

"I shall hope till then; and even this silence, worse than death, does not divide true lovers," she answered, passionately. "What, indeed, is separation in the letter, since in the spirit it can not exist?"

More of this strange talk we held that night, and then I learned, for the first time, how thoroughly Pontremoly had imbued the fresh young nature with his fatalistic notions and dreamy pantheism. Theresine, who looked and seemed so childlike, could understand better than any of us the exquisitely harmonious and gifted being whom we all loved and mourned so bitterly.

For the first time Theresine's actions became transparent to me as the waters of a brooklet bubbling over pebbles. She believed too strongly in the supernatural doctrines with which Pontremoly had inoculated her despair, or even doubt as yet. Thus explained, her cheerfulness no longer heartless, her belief in the future no longer incredible.

But for us, who could not cherish the same hopes, courage could awaken with the same assurance of revelation by-and-by, the mystery became as a nightmare, and time did not remove it from our souls.

IV.—THE LAST MYSTERIOUS VISIT.

Tears passed—years on; and if we did not grow reconciled to the mysterious loss of our comrade, at least we began to look upon it as inevitable, and consequently to be endured. Any thing like a vestige of evidence never appeared. Gradually the police ceased to grumble, and the public to make inquiry. A young medical student had disappeared—an Italian—given to queer hallucinations and somewhat unorthodox notions about the social destiny with tout. The Parisian world has too much on its hands to concern itself beyond the moment about a single man.

Exactly a year after the rueful day on which we had lost sight of Pontremoly, Mademoiselle Euphrosine gave a reception on Thursday than usual. In the first place, the courtship of twenty years seemed likely to come to an end; for, in consequence of which I received a small legacy, Monsieur Lagueuse had made our hostess an offer of marriage; in the second, our term of study was drawing to a close, and Mademoiselle Euphrosine Krebs should have reopened her école as Madame Lagueuse, to save us to be leagues away from Paris. Krebs was about to return to Stuttgard. Alick had accepted the post of engineer and draughtsman in the Messageries Imperiales; I, too, reluctantly saw myself drifting into that most stagnant of respectable careers, a commercial life. With regard to Theresine, our feelings remained much the same, excepting that Alick grew more hopeful as the time of separation drew near.

"There is no accounting for the ways of women," he said to me one day, confidentially. "Theresine has given me a promise."

I looked up in amazement.

"You may well want to know more," he said; "but I have promised to tell you all, if ever Theresine accepts a second lover, I am he."

This hope, which I could but regard as deceptive as the shadow of a flying bird, lightened on to the last. He paid court to her with a persistency that would have been ludicrous in another man, but was pathetic in his. He endeavored to make money, so that the wooing, if ever it came to that, should be done in a shower of gold. But Fortune was in the bounds either to his infatuation or his blindness.

On this last gala evening that we were all to spend together, Alick had come to Krebs on a bouquet of exquisite roses, which he presented immediately on entering the room. They were hardly decked in their brilliant colors. Theresine that night. She no longer wore a child's stuff frock, and secluded herself in her own chamber, of the room. Her beautiful hair had been plaited braided about her exquisitely shaped head, and adorned with a wreath of blush roses, a transparent silvery scarf falling over her shoulders, her lips, cheeks, and eyes aglow with excitement—the whole effect was all which Mademoiselle Euphrosine's Thursdays but just begun!

Doubtless Theresine's piquant beauty and naive character had much to do with her success that night; but to us the child seemed to have merged into the maiden as if by magic. Where had she learned this new art of repartee, that delicate, full art of pleasing and tormenting in a breath? Who had taught her the woman's way of delicacies coupled with coquettish coercion?

"What fools you and I have been?" whispered Krebs as we elbow. "The race is the swift, and the battle to the strong." My uncle have stepped into Pontremoly's shoes had we set our minds to it."

He joined the whist players. I sat down at the piano, and turned over Mademoiselle Euphrosine's music-book, alas! for the last time. Alick had to see his cab at the door, and ten o'clock little Antoinette prepared tea, and the vociferation was hushed for a while. Mademoiselle Euphrosine was the most patiently gallantly divided a plaisir biscuit between them, and sat munching it, with sentiment, side by side with Theresine, who had completely occupied the sofa, sipping tea and talking scandal. Krebs and Alick had been summoned to the whist table by cups, and stood apart contemplating every one by turns. Theresine, for the only time that evening, sat alone, and especially in the same spot where we had first seen her sitting months and months ago. I remembered how Pontremoly had taken the covered basket beside her, and sung as so boyishly jealous, and then the great mystery of our poor friend's disappearance forced itself upon my mind as if it were the thing of to-day.

Must it remain forever unsolved? I said to myself, with fierce impatience. Must we go on and on our way, down to our graves, and never unriddle the awful game that Fate has played with us? If this is so, then indeed are the fatalists to be envied, who console themselves with the assurance that all is foreclosed from the beginning of time; one thought, aphilosophic, generous thousands: and as I stood thus, thinking so little of the scene and the life present with me, launching so recklessly into irreparable circumstances, many minutes had passed.

When this mood of intense retrospection was over, I looked up involuntarily. The women coquetted, the men flattered, the lights gleamed; but Theresine was no longer alone.

Was I dreaming, or was it indeed Pontremoly who sat beside her, his face intent, his slight figure bent forward, his fingers toying with the flowers that lay on her lap, his whole attitude recalling that evening on which he had first taught me to cry?

I felt as if turning to stone; I could not utter a word; I could not lift my hand; I could only gaze and gaze with increasing bewilderment. How came he there, and thus? Why had he entered secretly? Why did no one notice his presence?

A voice at my elbow refreshed my clouded senses, as cold water rouses the swooning. It was Alick who was speaking. Pale, his hair bristled, his eyes dilating, he lifted an unsteady finger in the direction of Pontremoly, and whispered:

"See, he is going—he is gone! Oh! Lightfoot, what has been my own seen to-night?"

I looked up. The chair beside Theresine was vacant. She sat gazing at it, pale but calm.

"Do you think she saw—it—him?" asked Alick, under his breath. "Speak to her, Lightfoot; I can not."

I drew him a little aside, and tried to reason away our strange hallucination. The empty chair, the unconcerned faces of the guests, Theresine's evident calm, all went to prove that we had been the victims of our own excited fancy. I did not wish to believe myself nor any one else subject to the agencies of supernatural; and it is not a well-known fact in physiological history that the brain in a diseased state of activity can produce the strongest whatsoever of the unseen spiritual conception?

"My dear fellow," I said, "granted that we have both been under a delusion—what more likely?—but do not magnify the delusion into a supernatural manifestation. Doubtless you were thinking, as I was myself, intently. Was it not natural that imagination should do the rest, and seem to present him in living reality before us?"

He shook his head mournfully, and was about to answer, when Mademoiselle Antoinette coming up with bonbons for us, we were compelled to accept it, and her company also. When we were released the party had begun to disperse. Theresine sat on the sofa alone, and, after lingering in the deserted salon for some time, politeness bade us to depart.

"Theresine is gone to bed, somewhat overcome with the evening's excitement, pauvre enfant," Mademoiselle Euphrosine said, apologetically "and she has made your adieux to-morrow, gentlemen; we must not spoil such a pleasant evening by making them now."

We went away, and Alick and betook ourselves homeward along the still brilliantly-lighted Boulevards. For a time no one spoke, neither Alick nor myself feeling disposed to allude to the crowning event of so many strange ones linked with Mademoiselle Euphrosine's Thursdays. We noticed Alick's hat and cane, seemed equally abstracted. At last he said, speaking with considerable effort:

"I wonder what you two will think of me when I tell you that, if ever I saw any one on any thing in my life, I saw Pontremoly, or Pontremoly's ghost, sitting by Theresine's side to-night. I couldn't be drunk on sirop à groseilles and weak tea. I do not turn mad all in a moment. I—I saw him! How I wish that some one else had seen him too!"

We stopped short and looked into each other's anger faces.

Krebs read our secret at a glance.

"You saw him—you!" he cried, turning from Alick to myself. "Are we all mad alike? Are we to believe that there are doppel-gängers in the world? Are we dreaming?"

We tried to compare our experiences soberly, and they coincided with almost complete exactness. Each of us had been lost into a long train of reflections, beginning with the first evening of Theresine's appearance in Mademoiselle Euphrosine's salon, and ending with our present friend's strange fate. Each had felt the same impatience at the mystery enshrouding it; each had recalled Pontremoly's words of happy abandonment, while we stood looking on, so foolishly envious!

Krebs was fain to accept the supernatural interpretation, and to look forward toward his way of thinking; but I combated it with all the force of which I was capable, and succeeded in wholesome horror of mystic and spiritual influences, and would not confess to the somewhat shock that had in the first instance taken possession of me.

"You must remember," I urged, as we talked over the matter for the last small hours, "that we have all been working with abnormal activity during the past week for our examination. If we were to go to the police in such hunger we should be in a high fever, and my only wonder is that Pontremoly's apparition is the first we have seen."

"I have not a shadow of doubt," Alick answered, "that Pontremoly is dead, and that this was the warning. Treat the matter lightly as you will, Lightfoot, I think my own thoughts about it. When my father died at the taking of Schastopol, my mother was him unlatch our garden gate and enter. When my great-uncle—"

"Settle it between you as you like," I said, taking up my bedroom candle, "but for Heaven's sake don't ask me to be umpire."

And I went to bed, heart-sick and heart-sore with the events of Mademoiselle Euphrosine's Thursdays from first to last.

V.—THE THREADS UNRAVELLED.

The next day and the next we called at Mademoiselle Euphrosine's, but Theresine did not appear. The poor child, said the hostess, had been suffering from feverish headache ever since their last soirée, and could not be induced to rise from her bed.

"My own idea," Mademoiselle Euphrosine said, lightly, "is that the child is suffering from mal de pays, and, if so, the sooner we send her back to her parents in Italy the better, though it would be a thousand pities to leave off cultivating that fine voice of hers."

Must we, then, leave Paris without seeing Theresine for the last time? Alick recklessly threw up his appointment at the eleventh hour, determined to have his promised word of adieu. Krebs put off his journey to the Vaterland for a week or two, gallantly bent upon acting the faithful knight to the last. I was in no particular hurry to get back to England, and thus it happened that Mademoiselle Euphrosine's wedding drew near, and found us still in Paris.

Theresine continued to remain invisible, and our messages, flowers, and other attentions brought nothing but a word or two of thanks by way of return. One afternoon Alick came back from his daily visit of inquiry with a white face.

"She is very ill," he gasped out. "Even Mademoiselle Euphrosine acknowledges it. They have got a doctor at last."

We were all anxious enough, but Alick's misery was too deep to witness. He could not sleep, he could not eat, he could not rest any where. His time was spent in hovering about Mademoiselle Euphrosine's apartment, doing little errands for the troubled ladies, fetching Theresine's medicines, etc. At this time poor Alick himself looked like a convalescent, so gaunt, pale, so attenuated, so hollow-eyed was he; and we were all too much absorbed in Theresine's illness to think of the strange events that had gone before. Pontremoly's memory ceased to trouble us for a while.

At last the crisis came. Theresine died. Of Krebs's distress and my own, of Mademoiselle Euphrosine's and her sister's concern, of poor Alick's misery, I need not speak. These critical catastrophes darken every life by turns, and are mercifully softened by years of fate and effort which, or would be too hard to bear. We do not cease to suffer, but by God's goodness, as time wears on, we cease to despair.

Alick's state of mind became so terrible that, to prevent him from being taken off to a maison de fous, our kind friend Krebs carried him off to Central America instead.

A gigantic scientific expedition, under Imperial auspices, was about to start, and the surgeon selected to accompany it fell ill. Krebs obtained the appointment, coupled with the privilege of taking a friend who would be of himself useful. The two departed. When opportunity offered Krebs sent me letters, which, as time wore on, became satisfactory. I learned that Alick would come home, if not a happy, at least a resigned man, and spoke of the expedition as one of great excitement and adventure.

For myself, I remained in Paris, determined to make a last effort on behalf of the mystery so vital to us all. Circumstances had occurred in my family affairs which improved my position, and rendered the so-dreaded country practice no longer obligatory. In a word, I had inherited some money. My efforts, and consequent success, will be best told by the following letter which I wrote to Krebs and Alick about six months from the time of their departure.

"DEAR KREBS AND ALICK,—I have at last something to tell you which can be believed. I have seen Pontremoly and Pontremoly. As soon as Mademoiselle Euphrosine married I gave up my flat, and took a lower to possess myself of Mademoiselle Antoinette's confidence. I have gained your friend and my own by describing the artifices and enumerating the shifts to which they have been reduced by your strange disappearance. Make love to her I could not do, but I hit upon a happy expedient. I proved myself to her as if I had been a lover, and took her to sights and spectacles as if I were her brother. From the contrivance to the last I had my reward. She told me under the Artistes's vow of secrecy, which, for you, neither will nor can I break, the facts concerning our poor Theresine's death.

"The day after the ball at which we sent Alick she had been persuaded of Pontremoly's presence during the whole evening, and that the ghost of her friend had convinced her of his death. Being pressed further on this point, she told me that the last time any of us was most likely to be accounted for by the fact of our having been in the secret of Pontremoly's flight. And all of her own relations belonging to the Italian party at the time of the flight, she had been summoned on some secret and dangerous mission of a political character, and had left Paris in a state of terror, and had, to convert others to the good cause.

"Pontremoly had promised to either of two conclusions. Theresine was to accompany him on the journey by the police, or he had fallen a victim to some political outbreak while fulfilling the mission of his secret.

"But how to arrive at any thing like ultimate truth? To go to Italy seemed the only rational plan: yet it was not without dangers and doubts. The most conscientious person would hardly fail to be caught tripping in the labyrinthine mazes of that Italian Tyburn, and months and years might elapse before any result were obtained.

"I started for Italy, however, and after many fruitless journeys to Theresine's old haunts in Tuscany, and to the little country town where resided Pontremoly's old friend, Jacinto, took myself to Rome, and there, as conquer, pursued my inquiries as circumspectly as I could.

"When we meet I will tell you all; till then it suffices to say that Pontremoly met with death while fulfilling what to him was a sacred errand. It is a consolation to me, though his fate was a cruel one, as he used to say, so prematurely, and from the hand of an assassin, he died for the cause he loved so well—namely, Italian freedom.

"Poor Theresine! and poor Theresine! I have today placed some wreaths of immortelles upon her lonely little grave in the Cimetière Montmartre. You can safely deal it if you inquire for the grave of Mezzpre, Theresine's name in full. I am the only mourner.

"And, now, good-by! I am off to England at last. I can afford to ask you to come and see me now, being comparatively a rich man. Come as soon as you can, and, over our cigars and coffee, we will talk over old days and old friends. Yours always,

"HARRY LIGHTFOOT."

With this letter properly ends my story. I add, however, that my old comrades are both prospering, and that even Alick is able to recall calmly the strange events connected with Mademoiselle Euphrosine's Thursdays.

BURNING OF STEAMERS AT CINCINNATI.

We illustrate on page 349 the disastrous conflagration which took place on the Ohio River, at Cincinnati, on the morning of May 12. A little before two o'clock a fire broke out in the Clifton, caused, it is supposed, by the upsetting of a lamp. Five steamers were laying in close proximity, and above these six others. In less than half an hour the six steamers below were destroyed, nearly all of them being burned to the water's edge. Those on board the Clifton were just able to escape with their lives, so rapid was the conflagration. Before the earliest engines could reach the scene four of the boats were already in flames. The heat was so intense that they could only approach the boats with the greatest difficulty. Not for many hours was the fire under control, and they fought their fierce foe at close quarters. Some of the boats had on board a large quantity of oil, and as the barrels caught fire they floated out into the river, and then down the stream, making it a stream of burning fire. The Kentucky shore was lighted up, and the flames showed its banks filled with spectators drawn from their beds by the magnificent spectacle.

A deck-hand was burned to death on the Clifton, and it is reported that five persons on the Cheyenne suffered a similar fate. Three or four men from the Darling were drowned in their attempt to get ashore. The loss of property amounted to nearly $1,000,000, exclusive of cargo.

CORAL.

The part played by the coral animal in the history of the world is so great and important as to astonish all but those who know and understand the power of Him who ordains strength out of the mouth of babes and sucklings, and comprehendeth the dust of the earth in a measure, and "taketh up the isles as a very little thing." Whether we look backward or to the present time, we see how great a part has been assigned to the small creature of whose characteristics and works it is proposed to say something in this paper. In the depths of the limestone and tertiary formation of the earth's crust there are substantial proofs of the long duration and the laborious energy of the coral animal; and if we look abroad at the present day, and see the magnificent results which the united toil of the creature's industry are producing upon the face of the earth—rather of the ocean—we cannot but equally wonder at the wisdom and the might of that great God who makes all His creatures subserve the grand scheme of creation, and employs in some of the most insignificant among them the task of constructing "continents to be."

With the works of the coralline—for by this name it will be convenient to call the coral animal—in the past, we have here no concern. Suffice it to say that a peculiar formation, known to geologists as coralline rag, is called after the little creature, and establishes the nobility of its pedigree. But the coralline's wonders of the present is still more important, to judge by what one sees of it in actual operation. Four distinct forms of dry land does the coralline contribute to appear, though the material with which it builds is the same in all. There are, of course, several styles of building, some of the animals choosing to build elaborate and splendid work, while the great mass of this simple operative class, without much taste, are with only a general design, built up a fabric more remarkable for its solidity and strength than for its beauty. The same sort of creature, however, is employed, the only difference being that with the coralliun, as with the human beings there is skilled and unskilled labor in the market, each doing good service, and neither being quite independent of the other. Before describing the little creatures itself, let us take a glance at its productions, which have been spoken of as so vast and so important.

The works of the coral are known as lagoon islands or atolls, encircling reefs, barrier reefs, and coral fringes. The first-named are rings of coral, varying in diameter, and sometimes in section of the sea. They are rarely higher above the level of the sea than from six to twelve feet: and though some of them are large enough for thousands of the solid coral rock forming the ring is not more than a quarter of a mile. In consequence of this, they are frequently not visible from seaward until the spectator is close upon them, and generally therefore within their dangerous influence. Sometimes—that is to say, when the atoll is not a very recent one—they are conspicuous by the cocoa-nut and pandanus trees, of which the seeds, brought from a distance of many hundreds, it may be thousands, of miles, by the great current of ocean, have taken root and formed a covert for birds and insects, which assist materially in welding the crude coral mass, and in making the soil of the mean that which by nature could yield him no comfort, though it might do him infinite harm.

The size of these atolls varies considerably, the largest known is in the Maldive Archipelago, and is eighty-eight miles in length and nearly twenty in breadth; others, again, are not more than three-fourths of a mile across from edge to edge. The Pacific and Indian oceans are, par excellence, the homes of lagoon islands; but they they flourish in countless multitudes, and form one of the chief difficulties to navigation, because of their treacherous character, lying as they do almost perdus a little above the surface of the water. In many cases, however, it is quite possible for ships, even those of large size, "out of this nettle danger to pluck the flower safety;" for if the channel by which the communication is kept up between the surrounding sea and the interior of the atoll can only be discovered, and be deep enough for the passage of the vessel, there could not be any safer hiding-place from the wind, or surer covert from the tempest, than a lagoon island. Yet the sea never so troubled outside the magic circle, roll the surf never so fiercely up and over the outer sides of the island, within the precincts of the lagoon itself all is calm and quiet; and not only so, but there is anchorage as well, though outside the line of the deep-sea lead may show no bottom. Fifty fathoms would show a deep lagoon, twenty would be a more common depth, and the bottom at that depth affords good holding for the anchors. On the seaward side the coral shelves gradually to about twenty-five fathoms, which is the depth at about two hundred yards away from the outer edge; beyond that the soundings suddenly cease, and the lead at three hundred yards away from where soundings were struck at twenty-five fathoms. Upon this gradually sloping side the sea-water breaks in a perfect fury of surf, with a roar so loud that it is often the first indication to the mariner of his approach to the neighborhood of danger. The sound of it may be heard many miles off.

How are these atolls formed? At one time it was supposed that the coralium selected some site at the bottom of the sea, on which, with an infinite array of its fellows, it worked and piled up the structure, like another Tower of Babel, reached that height which, for wise purposes, it was not allowed to exceed—that is, three hundred feet, upon which other rocks of a like nature moulded themselves, the mass growing until an island was formed. But the principle of agglutination was but understood, and there was nothing but conjecture on which to base the first part of the theory, which is now quite exploded. The belief now entertained by scientific men is that lagoon islands are but the crowned heads of submerged mountains, or, to speak more correctly, of mountains the plains to which are the bottom of the ocean. The coralliu, for reasons to be explained presently, have chosen to build on the sunken mountain-head; it is established as a matter of fact that they can not live, much less work, at a depth of more than 150. Darwin, who went as naturalist in the scientific voyage made by the late Admiral Fitzroy in H.M.S. Beagle, has describes what he considers to be the true process of formation of an atoll: "An island mountain, closely encircled by a coral reef, subsides, while the fringing reef, that lay many with it is constantly recovering its level, owing to the tendency of the coral animals to reach the surface by renewed superstructure; these constitute first a reef, encircling the island at a distance, and a considerable lagoon. The inclined island has wholly subsided, an atoll."

It has been said that these lagoon islands are to be found in the Pacific and Indian Oceans. Why not in the Caribbean Sea and the West Indian waters? It is said that the West Indian islands are the mere summits of a great district of country that once filled the Gulf of Mexico, that the land slipped, or was forced down by some convulsion of nature, and was buried—all save the mountain-tops, which were precipitous, and so high as to show far above the waves of the sea. But if the Bahama Banks and atolls in the West Indian seas, where barrier, fringing, and encircling reefs abound? The reason given is, that where the boundless depths in the Pacific and Indian Oceans are still subsiding, there is reason to think that the mountain-tops, or Islands, in the Gulf of the Caribbean Sea are continuously, though slowly, rising. Submergence is an essential condition to the development of the lagoon island, just as the contrary process is most favorable to the formation of other kinds of coral land; and if the appearance of the rising of the West Indies be correct, it will be sufficient to account for the absence of atolls in their seas.

Barrier reefs, which are the work of the same animals, are thus formed. At a distance of forty fathoms under water-level, sometimes less, it has been ascertained, at which the coralliu can live—the animals begin to build the first story of their house upon the sloping mountain of some island's side. They work onward and upward, till, by the upheaval of the land, or other causes, they come to a depth at which above the surface of the water. The atmospheric air is so much poison to them—they die when they breathe it, and that is the end of them. Then an additional though tiny brick in the structure which during life they contributed to rear. In the course of years a considerable mass of coral gets thus exposed to view, the birds and the waves bring seeds and plants to clothe it, and the new land becomes a geographical entity in the world.

Sometimes these barrier reefs encircle a place, and in course of time get joined on to it; when they are not so joined, it is probably due to the varying action of fresh-water streams, the wind and fluvial salts of which are, together with the atmospheric air, fatal to the coralliun. Another cause at times operates to prevent the junction of the greater with the less; the hardihood of the coralliun is such that it selects the outer or seaward side of the reef as the most favorable, once to the less troubled quarters on the inner side. The violence of the sea, though it will occasionally break down the outer reef, only lets little creature's masonry, and fling them high and dry on the rock above, not only does not frighten the coralliun, but actually encourages it. "Contra audentior ito," is the creature's motto when waves roll roughly and tempests roar, and in the action of the sea-water the coralliun finds a tonic and an incentive to exertion which it would lack in a calmer berth. The retired places are for the delicate and the artistic among zoonlia, who in them lead a luxurious, lazy sort of life, contributing ornament rather than substance to the upbuilding of the building on which the more rugged and hardy are employed as ordinary masons.

PEARLS BEHIND THE RUBIES.

When rosy lips part, pearls should glitter behind them. To preserve and beautify the dental enamel, there is no preparation like Sozodont, a compound of the most wholesome vegetable antiseptics, among which the Bark of the South American Soap-Tree, known to the natives as Quillay, and used by the Spanish Americans for cleansing, without impairing, the most delicate fabrics, is the most important.—[Com.]

PUMPING WATER.—The best, most economical way of doing this drudgery is by using ERICSSON'S CALORIC PUMP; of late greatly improved and rendered noiseless, it is the portable, does not get out of order, and is easily managed by any servant. For ten years past it has been in constant use in many of the finest houses on Murray Hill and at a large number of country seats, giving perfect satisfaction, and thus proving its durability and efficiency. One always in operation at the office, 164 Duane St.—[Com.]

So far as we know, ROCKWOOD, 839 Broadway, has the most varied experience and the most extensive apparatus for landscape and mechanical photography in the country. He is frequently employed by the HARPERS and the Central Park Commissioners.—Scientific American.

The Vital Statistics of the United States

show that periodical fevers and acute and chronic disorders of the stomach and liver are among the most prominent and fatal diseases in this country. Disobedience to the laws of health as regards diet, the use of pernicious stimulants, and the wear and tear of business excitement and of "fast life" generally, have much to do with the prevalence of these maladies in our cities; while in the West, and especially in the newly-opened districts, they are chiefly due to malaria, unwholesome water, and the exposure and privation incident to the new settlements.

NOW IT IS A FACT that it is as possible to protect the human system against these maladies as to guard life and property against the incursions of assassins and thieves. Strengthen the vital organization with and it becomes as capable of resisting the active principle of epidemic or endemic disease as a fire-proof safe is of resisting the action of combustion. This is the experience of thousands who have ventured unscathed by malarious disorders in the sickliest seasons, while their neighbors, who neglected to tone and regulate their systems with this unequaled medicinal stimulant, have fallen thick and fast around them. Weakness invites disease. Vigor repels it. Help nature to fight off and throw off with infection, whether it be in the air, the water, or the soil, with this matchless preparation—a compound of the rarest vegetable extracts with the purest of all diffusive stimulants.

HOSTETTER'S

THE COLLINS OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Our superior Oroide Watches having recently been imitated, said worthless Watches sold in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities, representing that our Watches are not the genuine Oroide, and only those purchasing directly from us can secure a genuine Watch of our manufacture. We have recently greatly improved our Oroide in appearance and durability, and, to protect the public from imposition hereafter, we have named it the

and we give notice that any one making use of this name will be prosecuted to the extent of the law.

This metal has all the brilliancy and durability of Gold—can not be distinguished from it by the best judges; retains its color till worn out, and is equal to gold excepting in intrinsic value. All our Gentlemen's Watches are Full-Jeweled Patent Levers; those for Ladies an improved escapement, better than a Lever for a small Watch; all in Hunting-Cases, and fully guaranteed by special certificate. Our Watches are equal in accuracy, style of finish, general appearance, and time, to a Gold one costing $150. Those for $20 are of extra fine finish, and are fully equal to a Gold Watch costing $200. Watches worn by ten of the Editors of this paper.

JEWELRY.—We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Collins Metal—Pins, Earrings, Sleeve-Buttons, Lockets, Studs, Finger-Rings, Bracelets, Pencils, Charms, Gold Fellow and Masonic Pins, &c., all of the latest and most elegant styles, and fully equal to gold in appearance and wear.

TO CLUBS.—Where six Watches are ordered at one time, we will send one extra Watch free of charge.

We positively employ no agents (who would require a commission), as we can not possibly manufacture the watches for less than our selling prices. Our reputable customers, therefore, have the benefit of our lowest prices. Parties in New York or elsewhere representing themselves as our agents are swindlers. The genuine Collins Watch can only be had at our office in New York City. Customers are requested, not to send money in letters, as we will send goods to any part of the United States to be paid for when taken from the express office, with privilege to pay all charges. In ordering, please plainly state name, town, county, and state. Customers in the city will remember that our only office is

ADDRESS TO SMOKERS.

In reply to the many inquiries made daily in regard to Meerschaum Pipes, we wish to state that we recommend, especially for home and office use, the plain Hungarian and Egg Bowls, with Welchsel Stems. They hold the most tobacco, and are the most durable and practical ones, being the easiest to clean. Or the Hamburg Bowls, having the largest surface to store color. For traveling, and street smoking, we recommend the London Straight and London Bend.

Being represented extensively throughout the country by our goods, we are desirous to have our Pipes—which are considered equaled by none—still more extensively used by those who relish a good smoke, and find Cigars too expensive. Therefore we have reduced our prices to the following:

We will sell a No. 3 Pipe for $5, and charge $1 additional for every number higher (Numbers run as high as No. 9, $10; No. 12, $15). Pipes from No. 8 to No. 8 are considered fair-sized ones; from No. 9 upward, large ones. In the price is included a Case and Stem.

Nice Amber Mouthpieces for Welchsel Stems we are selling Pipes $1 to $3 a piece.

We send by Express to collect on delivery, amount and charges; but suggest that the amount be sent in Registered Letter or Post-Office Money Order in advance to save consignee the express charges.

In conclusion, we wish to state that we warrant all our goods (which we stamp with our name) to be real Amber, genuine Meerschaum, and to color, and will readily give every information in regard to it, based on thirty years' experience in the trade, having received our Diploma in 1839 by the respective commissions in Europe, and we will ever uphold the fair fame we have acquired in the introduction of the MANUFACTURE OF GENUINE MEERSCHAUM GOODS into this country.

We cut Pipes and Cigar-Holders of any shape or design, mount them, do repairing, boiling, and polishing. Also, Amber Work done. And, main of all, do not charge exorbitant prices. For reference, we are in permission to refer to communications from thousands of our customers, representing all parts of society.

"FIRST TIME OF ASKING."—FROM A PAINTING BY W. HEMSLEY.—[SEE PAGE 354.]

"THE FIRST TIME OF ASKING."

The chief interest of the picture given on our first page lies in the humor of the situation, and of the characters and expressions, which, though sufficiently developed, does not reach the point of irreverence. The simplicity of the betrothed parties; the awkwardness of this first audacious avowal before the assembled village of their private love-making and their determination to take the awful step, reckless of all consequences, of being joined together in holy matrimony, are very amusingly expressed. Irresistibly droll is the gaping, dumfoundered astonishment of the lover at suddenly hearing his name announced before all the world, and realizing that he is now a hero of public interest; while equally pleasant is it to mark the mingled pride and blushing shamefacedness of this sweet-faced, but by no means downcast look, and nervous knotting of her handkerchief. Ah! it is for Lobbin and Lucy a moment of purest, supremest romance. For such an occasion well might Lobbin attire himself in his Sunday best, in colors various as the gayest of the birds in patriotism, those colors brought to a focus by that splendid flowered crimson-velvet waistcoat, and foiled by the full-blown black-cravat; well might Lucy don the mattiest of bonnets and the neatest of brand-new cotton prints!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, JUNE 5, 1869.

OUR RELATIONS WITH ENGLAND.

MR. GOLDWIN SMITH has proved his friendly feeling for this country and his faith in the principle of our government too often and too well not to be sure of a most attentive audience whenever he speaks of subjects in which we are mutually interested. During the late rebellion no man in England more plainly denounced the sympathies and the hopes of the aristocratic party in that country, and no one more vigorously stated the real grounds of the conflict in this. A personal friend and devoted admirer of RICHARD COBDEN and JOHN BRIGHT and JOHN STUART MILL, Mr. SMITH is a most ably educated statesman with them the cause of liberty and civilization common to England and to this country, which was desperately assailed by the slave masters here, supported by the aristocracy there. His recent discourse at Ithaca will therefore command the most interested, as it certainly deserves the most candid, consideration from every loyal American.

Mr. SMITH speaks always very plainly and very strongly. He did so at Ithaca. He showed with a just pride that his country was a changing, if not a changed, country. He insisted upon the undoubted fact that there are two Englands, the England of the people and of the aristocracy; and he declared that the sympathy of the former was with us during our war, although the unwonted dearness of the cotton supply would have been their utter ruin. But while this is true, it seems not to be sufficiently considered by Mr. SMITH that it is not with those who have chosen to say, but with those who controlled the government in England that we had to deal. It is true again that the Government might have done worse. It might have recognized the independence of the rebels, and have made a treaty to furnish aid against us. This is what the London Times says. But is a valid defence of a public enemy to say that he might have been a murderer?

The action of the Government of England, we think, demonstrably showed an unfriendly spirit, and we do not believe that any thing is gained in the discussion by denying it. It may be in vague and sentimental charge, but individual and national judgment is profoundly influenced by sentiment. If it can be shown that the feeling of the controlling class in England was hostile, that was not strictly neutral, even without asserting that there was intentional breach of faith—then certainly it is very natural that the public mind of this country should be exceedingly excited, and it becomes more probable that actions were tolerated which would otherwise have been prohibited.

The Government was Whig or Liberal. Lord PALMERSTON was notoriously not friendly to this country. The Duke of Newcastle had been gratified by his reception here. Lord RUSSELL was an old Whig and a reformer of '32. Mr. GLADSTONE was undoubtedly a Liberal. But there was nothing in this Cabinet to make a presumption in favor of freedom here. With the three noblemen the Patrician instinct was certainly stronger than sympathy with a republic. Lord RUSSELL was an antislavery man, indeed, but not only was he an aristocrat, but we had officially disclaimed that the war was an anti-slavery movement, and he did not hesitate to say that the North was fighting for empire and the South for independence. These are not the words of a friend, nor of a minister of neutral sympathies. And, indeed, at the GARRISON breakfast Lord RUSSELL confessed that he was wrong. Mr. GLADSTONE was plainly indifferent. Certainly it was not a Cabinet that represented the sympathetic feeling of men like GOLDWIN SMITH, and CODDEN, and BRIGHT, and CAIRNES, and MILL; and the action of a Cabinet in which the Foreign Secretary spoke and acted as Lord RUSSELL spoke might justly be regarded with suspicion.

We have no intention of multiplying presumptive proofs of this unfriendly disposition. The London paper and Mr. SMITH lay great stress upon the fact that we do not feel so angrily toward France and Spain and the other powers that simultaneously granted belligerent rights to the rebels. The reasons seem to be evident. England is our mother country. England was the chief anti-slavery nation; and although that might not have prevented her from making a league with us against the rebels; and although we had officially put slavery out of the question, yet at least the sympathies of such a nation would not have precisely followed against us. Moreover, the political sympathies of the Union party in this country were, as we supposed, shared by the Liberal party in power in England, and were therefore expected nothing more for the rebels than the strict letter of the law, certainly we did not anticipate favor for them. And above all, England and France was the chosen and successful base of the hostile expeditions against us on the seas. And the French press constantly slandered us, but the French press generally cheered the depredations upon our marine, had the French foreign minister openly sneered at us, and had privateers escaped after our official and diplomatic remonstrance, and ravaged our commerce, we should have the same conviction that France was not an impartial neutral that we now have in regard to England.

There is one striking evidence of this unfriendliness which was mentioned in a very able pamphlet by CHARLES SUMNER, of Boston, upon the neutral position of England, which was published in 1863. When the rebels were recognized as a belligerent power it must have been upon the implied condition that they would conform to the laws of nations. Now, if any thing may be considered established in international law it is that piracy, declared at sea remains in abeyance until condemnation by a competent court, which must be held in the country of the captors. But the rebels never had any prize court, and they never pretended to have. The rebel captor scuttled and burned his prize and appropriated the cargo. This was not once, but always. It continued for four years. It was in effect sheer piracy. It was a defiance of one of the most sacred laws of war, by a belligerent seeking to establish a sovereignty upon the ruins of the government; and England, in whose ports the ships had been built, manned, and equipped, and who, as "mistress of the seas," should have been especially bound to prevent the prostitution of international law to protect piracy, did not even shrug her shoulder, and of course did not protest. If the Yankee ships had burned every thing they took and appropriated their cargoes without even a pretense of prize courts, would England probably have remained passive? Was it not the plain duty of a sincere neutral to remonstrate with the belligerent whom it had recognized, and threaten to withdraw that recognition unless the offender conformed to the laws of nations?

How this subject was viewed at the time by our friends in England may be seen in an extract from an article by EDMUND ROBERTSON, in Fraser's Magazine for January, 1864. "Let us endeavor to represent to ourselves this episode in our history as it is regarded by an impartial posterity." During a great civil strife between two branches of a kindred nation—into the merits of the cause at issue we, for the moment, forbear to enter—the one party is said less to observe a strict neutrality, three formidable vessels, in defiance of our authority, and in disregard, at all events, of the spirit of international law, have issued from our ports. These vessels, built in English dock-yards, equipped and armed by English artisans, paid for by a loan raised in the English money market, in part manned by English sailors—an English navy in all but the name and the flag—now roam the ocean, plundering and destroying the property of their adversaries, and, in some instances, our own. The English Government, by simply asserting an unquestionable right, has let in its power, if not to arrest their career, at all events greatly to curtail their capacity for mischief; but this assertion of its right it omits to make. When with these exceptions we coupled the facts that a portion of the English people has loudly proclaimed its sympathy with the cause of the Depredators, and that English shipping is largely a gainer through its comparative immunity from the risks incurred by the belligerent marine, and, lastly, that shameful incidents—the chief among them the English Parliament greeted the announcement made by the principal violator of the law, of the magnitude of the depredations—when these facts are placed on the impartial record of history what will be the judgment of posterity?—will the page be one whilst future Englishmen will read without a blush?"

With these unquestionable facts before them, is it not evident why Americans believe the neutrality of England to have been unfriendly, and why they are unwilling to consider the ravages of the Alabama and the Fenian raids upon Canada as matters that may properly set off each other?

A NEW LAW IN NEW YORK.

The late transactions in the court of Judge CARDOZO should be more intelligibly explained than they have yet been, or they convict him of the most extraordinary abuse of his position. The Judge very naturally and properly was afraid that if a child of a divorced woman, who had been made its guardian, lived with the mother in the house of its own which it never knew or owned, the child would go astray. He wished to save the child. He stated, we believe, that he had had awake at night troubled in mind because of the child. But when the mother should have appeared before him she had fled out of the State with her child, and, as was charged, with the connivance of the aunts. Upon this mere thereupon arrested for contempt of court and for keeping a house of ill-fame. They naturally sued for a writ of habeas corpus. But they were imprisoned for five days without being examined at all. How much longer they might have been held at the pleasure, or the displeasure, of the Judge, it is impossible to say.

When a lawyer appeared for the prisoners and asked for an investigation, he was warned by the Judge that if he engaged in the case he would make a personal enemy of him for life. But the lawyer was apparently undismayed even by this appalling prospect, and persisted. Whereupon the Judge adjourned the hearing for a week because he was so busy. When it was suggested that the law demanded an immediate examination of the writ, of persons charged with crime, and that if he were so busy there were other judges, the Judge, armed at all points, announced that he had the promise of the other judges that they would not hear the case, but would refer it to him. That is. Judges SUTHERLAND and CLERKE had promised that the imprisonment should be investigated only by the Judge who ordered it, although Judge CLERKE, as is stated, had issued the writ.

The reputation of the judiciary of the city of New York is familiar. If it were not for processes for contempt of court it might be said to be a by-word. But we advise nobody to go to test by his arrest and imprisonment, and the fellow-judges of the imprisoning magistrate agree to leave the whole subject in his hands. If the facts are stated and published in the newspapers, are correct, Judge CARDOZO has abolished the writ of habeas corpus that he may try to save a child from the chance of a disturbed life. And this is certainly good, but the means unhappily imperil the liberty of every citizen. A possible combination between Mr. FISK and a Judge would be frightful to contemplate. Some daring offender would make an observation upon the Fiskian character, and, presto! he goes to Ludlow Street Jail by order of a Judge. When he attempts to appear to have the matter investigated his lawyer is solemnly warned that he is making the Judge an enemy for life, and that applying to other judges they have promised not to interfere; and, finally, Judge CARDOZO is so busy by day, and his awake so exhaustingly, a prey to morbid sensitiveness, that really he has not the time to attend to the matter. In this manner Mr. FISK's offenders would learn the full cost of his displeasure.

Seriously, the facts as reported are such as should excite the strongest public feeling and expression. The two women are shameless, as was told; but the law is for their defense as much as for that of the most eminent and spotless citizens—for a CARDOZO or a M'CUNN. The object of the writ of habeas corpus is that the medium shall be known who may be unjustly imprisoned. The law demands that the examination be immediate. If Judge CARDOZO was so busy that he could not hear the case for a week why did he persuade the other judges to promise that they would not hear it? We distinctly aver that in these remarks we have included no contempt of Court. How could there be contempt for such administration of justice? It can only excite the profoundest admiration and inspire the utmost confidence.

THE ST. THOMAS TREATY.

An article from the chief Copenhagen journal, published after the return of General BLASTFORD to Denmark, states very strongly and lucidly the feeling of that country in regard to the St. Thomas treaty. It is written in a fair and temperate but dignified spirit, and presents considerations which should be thoughtfully weighed by the people of the United States. They are regarded, the article says, as the freest in the world, unlimited masters in the management of their commonwealth. For this very reason other powers should be able to feel confident that all dealings with them justice and honor will alone prevail. "It is not right that Denmark should be sacrificed because Andrew JOHNSON and WILLIAM H. SEWARD have given dissatisfaction." The journal is of opinion, and there can be no doubt that it expresses the sentiments of the Government, that if the agreement should now be pushed aside, suffered to drop without any further consideration, or be peremptorily rejected, the insult to Denmark would be so great that that country will refuse to believe in its possibility as long as there is the least hope left.

General RASTOFF, the Minister of War in Denmark, and for many years Danish Minister in this country, is fully aware of the constitutional requirement of the assent of the Senate to a treaty; and so indeed the existence of the Danish Assembly was necessary before the King could ratify the treaty. But, on the other hand, the Senate is unquestionably bound to an honorable action after the Constitution. The Danish treaty was signed in October, 1867, and submitted to the Senate in December, a month before the measures taken upon the islands. If the Senate had refused to ratify that would have been the end of the matter, and certainly Denmark would not have complained. But neither the newspapers, nor individual members of the Senate, seemed to be opposed to the confirmation of the treaty, and the vote of the islands was taken and was virtually unanimous in favor of union with the United States. Still the Senate did nothing. The time for assenting to the ratification was extended to February 29, 1868. The time passed, and nothing was done. General RASTOFF came to Washington, and urged, with great ability and unforcem courtesy, the confirmation of the agreement. But all in vain. The Senate has done nothing whatever. Two sessions have passed. Denmark has been placed in a very anomalous and almost humiliating position. While the treaty is apparently pushed aside to disappear.

Should we do this if Denmark were a great and formidable power? The country has a right to demand the grounds of the inaction of the Senate. No self-respecting American wishes to be forced into the appearance of contemptuous and ambiguity to a friendly and modest state like Denmark. It is asked, who gave Mr. SEWARD authority to buy land for the United States? Mr. SEWARD had no authority. Denmark does not claim that he had authority. Denmark did not ask him or us to buy the islands. The transaction was forced upon her by the official representative. The treaty was made. The vote of the islands, which is an exceptional point in the matter, was taken. Still the Senate will neither ratify the treaty nor ratify it, and will not say what principles does it proceed? That is a question which we have a right to ask. It ratified the Alaska treaty which the country generally has ratified it promptly. Why? To maintain our honor with Russia. But who gave Mr. SEWARD authority to buy land, or to bind the honor of the country?

Do the United States have honor to maintain only with great powers? The pride and honor of Russia could not have been touched by the refusal to ratify the Alaska treaty as those of Denmark by the contemptuous and total disregard of the St. Thomas treaty. Russia offered; Denmark was entreated. Russia took no vote; Denmark was relinquished by the islanders. If the treaty is defective, if it ought to be rejected, the Senate has still failed in its duty in not rejecting it. The reasons for rejection were no more evident before the vote was taken, or before the specified time for confirmation expired, than they are now. And we can not think that the Dayblader is right in saying: "If there have ever been international relations in which a party could be said to be bound by honor, this is really the case with the United States in its relations to Denmark regarding the West Indian islands." If we do not wish a naval station in the West Indies, if the area suggested is too large; if we do not wish to buy at any rate whatever, the Senate knew it as well a year ago as now. Why did it not give any reason while action within the specified time, or before the vote was taken, and so have spared the feelings of a friendly little ally?

LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT.

Appalled by the venality of some of the members of the last Legislature of this State, we observe some of the Republican journals are in favor of leaving the city of New York to itself. The feeling of some is, that the city can make as good a government for itself as the State gives it. That of others is, that if the people of the city wish dishonest men to tax and govern them, they ought to be left to suffer the consequences. That of others still is, that the Capitol is as corrupt as the City Hall. The reasoning of this last party is, that there are always enough honest men in the Legislature who can be bought, and that therefore designing men can work their will with the city as well in Albany as in New York; while there is a certain odium arising from the present system, and resting upon the Republican party, of denying to the city the right of local self-government.

It seems not to be remembered that all the rights of local self-government in the city are derived from the State. In our system this right is asserted of the whole political community, not of any part of it. When the rebels alleged that to oppose them was to deny the original American principle of self-government they very ingeniously begged the whole question. Government, says that principle, is justly derived from the consent of the governed. But who in the United States were the governed? Obviously the whole people. If a majority of them had been shown, there would have been at least consistency in the secession argument. But what was really asked was that a majority of the people of any State should control the people of the United States. Now in this State the division into counties, cities, towns, and villages, and the powers which are attached to each division, proceed from the State—from all the people. A uniform system of municipal, or village, or town government is wholly a matter of expediency, not of right in the American sense. This expediency is of course determined by experience. It is not settled a priori.

It was the evil experience of the old system in this city which produced the exceptional one under which it has lately been governed. And if the people of the State believe that the order and health of the city would be as well managed under authority of a strictly local appointment as under those which have been named by the State, they will undoubtedly restore the old system. The Central Park is the work of a Board appointed by the State. So is the Croton Aqueduct. Whether it would have been better for the State or for the city to intrust them to the hands and chances of a local appointment the people of the State, who are familiar with the city and its ways, must decide.

They must not, however, forget that the city is theirs as well as ours. It is their mart, their port, their metropolis. They are directly interested in its health and its order. If the city becomes "a sore" it is they who will be infected. To those who urge the extraordinary argument that if the people of the city wish to have it a Pandemonium they ought to have it so, it is enough to say that the argument is equally good for Mackerelville. The denizens of that quarter have as much "right" to a government independent of the city as the city has to independence of the State. The simple truth is, that every American community has a "right" to good order, and that must be secured by the wisest application of the American principle.

THE GOLD SPECULATORS.

As soon as it was announced that the Secretary of the Treasury would sell only a part of gold per week, and that he would apply the proceeds to the purchase of Five-Twenties, a speculation was set on foot in Wall Street to carry up the price of gold. The policy of purchasing the Five-Twenties rather than to purchase or pay off the outstanding three per cent. certificates was viewed by Wall Street, whether justly or not, as a decision against contraction, and as rather favoring expansion. The three per cent. certificates outstanding amount to about fifty-four millions, thirty-one of which as it supposed are held by the National banks. They constitute part of the reserve of banks, and thus pursue the nature of a currency.

National bank officers in Wall Street were understood, some of them at least, to have earnestly recommended to Mr. BOUTWELL to do as he has done. Half the three per cent. certificates been paid off to the extent of a million a week during this plethora of gold in the Treasury, the speculators in gold, who became purchasers of it simultaneously with the promulgation of the Secretary's views, would have been afraid to do so to any great extent, or at the sum price which it reached on the 20th May the quotations reached 144‡. This was the highest point, although it was said that sales were made at 145. The lowest point this year officially reported was about 131, at the time of Mr. BOUTWELL's advent into office.

Such violent fluctuations have always a very damaging effect. The house of SCARSDALE & Co., a firm of long standing and large means—composed of one or more Russians, and once connected with business in Russia—failed on the 24th May, when gold was at 140, after having sold large amounts at every successive advance from 133 upward. The market turned downward on the 20th, immediately after the difficulties of another operator for a fall became the subject of discussion.

Some Germans and other bankers in Wall Street, caught by the high price of gold, sold exchange largely, drawn against bonds, which bonds went by the steamer of the 22d May. The bonds were sold in London on the 20th and 21st by means of the cable telegraph, and part of the exchange drawn against them was disposed of in like manner. Bonds are sold in London deliverable twice a month (1st and 15th, as near as may be), and they are consequently sent for delivery accordingly. The bankers who dealt largely in bonds in London there and here, and direct a delivery on the other side to complete the sale, by telegram, and remit others to take their place.

The sale of exchange through means of the cable is conducted often in this manner. A person here, having funds in London, directs his banker or principal there to transfer a given sum to the banker of the New York purchaser. The party who receives the transfer in England notifies the New York purchaser of the fact, and the latter thereupon pays the seller the price of the exchange in gold or its equivalent. The day in England being five hours earlier than here, when noon arrives in New York business is over in London. So that these telegrams received in a transfer are ordinarily sent from New York in the afternoon, and it is usual to answer them in London at early business hours the next morning. A message sent from London at ten o'clock in the morning announcing the completion of the transfer reaches New York before business commences on the same day; and when a banker goes to the office of Wall Street at ten o'clock he finds the message on his table. Both parties use the cable, and the rule is that the seller pays for the message over, and the purchaser for the answer. Large amounts have been sold in this manner, arising out of transactions in bonds. Parties whose credit here is too small to get exchange in the ordinary manner find it a great convenience to sell through the cable, as they are put in funds in about twelve hours; whereas, if they had to wait for telegraphic notice of the acceptance in London of regularly drawn bills, a fortnight or more would be consumed; and if notice by mail were required double the time would be necessary.

The break in the gold market on the 20th and 21st May was due, it is said, to a great change in the Treasury policy. It was stated in Wall Street that, instead of selling only one million of gold per week, the Secretary intended to sell two, and that he would apply the whole or part of the proceeds to the purchase of the three per cent. certificates. It appears, however, that while the sales of gold are increased to $2,000,000 per week (half on Monday and half on Thursday) the purchase of $1,000,000 of bonds continues. Bonds in London did not decline to correspond with the fall of gold here, and consequently the sale of bonds abroad at a profit was possible. This sale of bonds to the extent of several millions, of a description founded upon it, had a powerful effect to lower the price of gold and to postpone its shipment.

The advance by the Bank of England in the rate of interest to five per cent., and the rapid and large advance in the price of gold here, have created a profound impression at Washington and in all financial circles. The policy of the Bank of England was not a matter of choice; it was due to the financial situation, and will unquestionably be followed as soon as possible by such further increase in the rate of interest as the object may require. As it arose from financial pressure, which was felt also in Frankfort, Hamburg, and Paris, it will be in effect on our securities? Will it prevent the absorption of more bonds? and if so, will it induce a return of them to our shores?

The act of March, 1867, which authorized the creation of fifty millions of three per cent. certificates, directed that they should be made payable in lawful money on demand, and be issued in the manner prescribed in the 4th section of the act of February 25, 1862, which provided that the interest on the notes thereby made payable

THE CUBAN REVOLUTION—RUINS OF GENERAL CESPEDES'S PLANTATION.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR CUBAN ARTIST.]

CUBAN AFFAIRS.

THE Cubans have had a great success in the field, the first of any importance in their revolution. The engagement was fought in the district of Puerto Principe. Generals QUESADA and CAMILLO had gathered together over 4000 of their best troops at a point beyond Las Minas and intrenched themselves. This position was assaulted, May 3, by the Spanish army under General LESCA. The assault would have been successful had not the MARQUIS OF SANTA LUCIA, who had been some miles off, hurried to QUESADA'S assistance. His forces, united to those of LOPEZ PEDALTA, charged the Spaniards on the left flank; this movement decided the action, the enemy flying and leaving his convoy in the hands of his pursuers. Three seven hundred Catalan volunteers were beaten by a band of Cubans armed with machetas, or cane-knives, only. This success inspires the insurgents with fresh vigor. It is certain that at the battle of LAS MINAS the Spaniards suffered a loss of life far greater than the Cubans, and they were driven from the field.

We illustrate the decisive point of this battle on this page. We also give two other illustrations contributed by our Cuban artist. We will let him give his own description of the sketches:

"Our first sketch is a view of General CESPEDES'S plantation, destroyed at the commencement of the revolution. It is situated upon the coast, a few miles above Manzanillo, and has a fine view seaward. There is a narrow belt of mangrove on the adjacent shore, from which the land extends some distance in a level plain, about half of which, not being good sugar land, was fenced off for pasture, and then rises in a gentle slope to the table-land. The road from the 'Batey,' or square, in which the buildings were placed, down to the wharf at which the sugar was loaded in launches, to be taken to Manzanillo, can still be traced. The alleys and cane pieces can scarcely be traced, and the blackened ruins of the building are almost overgrown. The whole scene is one of complete desolation. The proximity of the estate to the coast has been taken advantage of by the Spanish cruisers to bombard it.

"The second sketch represents a 'Convoy' going from Manzanillo to Bayamo for the relief of Count VALMASEDA. The supplies for the interior towns have to be taken from the coast at immense trouble and expense, besides the risk of losing them by the way, as in that department the government holds no ground except that upon which the troops for the time being may be standing. By their own confession some of the towns have been four and even seven months without supplies or communication of any kind with their countrymen. The garrisons began to believe themselves abandoned and forgotten by government and friends. The expedition represented was composed of over a hundred of the clumsy carts of the country, drawn by two yoke of oxen each, and a large number of pack mules, and guarded by nearly two thousand men. The distance traversed was about 16 leagues, partly through dense forests, with an almost impenetrable underbrush of rank vegetation, offering every advantage to the insurgents for ambuscades, while the rest of the road lies over the arid savannas, without food or water for man or beast. Advantage was taken by the insurgents of all favorable positions to molest the troops, who were obliged to clear the road with artillery where they could not flank the opposing forces. At the ford of the Canto River they were four hours effecting a crossing, the enemy having taken a strong position on the further bank. The insurgents finally succeeded in getting a body of troops over the river above and below the ford and flanked the Spaniards. If the Spaniards do not succeed in getting a SIX months' supply at all their military posts before the rainy season fairly sets in, they must abandon them or endure great suffering."

In connection with the battle of Las Minas it should be noted that the Spanish colored troops passed over to the Cuban side, and thus materially contributed to the success of the patriots. The force of the Spaniards engaged is estimated at 3500. The insurgents, from first to last, had engaged about 7000 men, a large proportion of whom were poorly armed.

General CESPEDES, in a proclamation, has assumed the title of President of the Republic, and has appointed to that the Secretary of War, AGUILERA Minister of War, and MANUEL DE QUESADA, General-in-Chief.

THE FIRE AT DAYTON, OHIO.

THE fire at DAYTON, OHIO, on May 16, of which we give an illustration on page 350, was the most disastrous in the history of that town. It consumed TURNER'S beautiful Opera-house, and almost an entire square of pleasant dwellings. The loss of property is estimated at $250,000, on which there was insurance for $125,000—the Dayton insurance offices suffering to the extent of $110,700. The fire is supposed to have broken out in the property or green room of the Opera-house. The Dayton Journal gives an account of the occasion. The water in the cisterns was exhausted in fifteen or twenty minutes, and wholesale ruin by some mad element cut six sections of the town, causing calamitous delay. There was no hope at any time for the Opera-house, but the burning of adjacent property might have been prevented with abundance of water and good management. It is considered doubtful whether the loss of the Opera-house can be repaired. The corner-stone of this edifice was laid in 1864, and the building was completed and opened by EDWIN FORREST in the play of "Virginius," on the night of January 1, 1866. Its total cost was $225,000. A chime of Dayton was cracked and burned to death while endeavoring to carry out some valuable goods from a store near the Opera-house.

TWO LIVES.

TWO names upon a yew-tree rudely cut,
Two lovers whispering by the church-yard wall,
Two children gayly round the solemn graves,
Give call for call.

Two lives that run so near in other years,
Two hands now locked in desolate love-taking,
Two lovers giving passionate kiss for kiss
In wild bewitching.

One life full up with crowded years of toiling,
One patient life with nothing day by day,
A world of hopes in one brief moment shattered
By life's decay.

Those names upon the yew-tree slowly fading,
Those dates long stolen by the cruel years,
That grave where the church-wall shadow glimmering
With heaven's tears.

LOOSE REINS.

DR. GILBERT was a man of honor and sense, of wit and position. And he was in love with a girl of seventeen! A very pretty girl, and yet more willful than pretty! For she was a man of honor and sense loves such a girl the odds are terribly against him, and his wooing is likely to prove uphill work. For he is apt to undervalue himself, and sure to shrink with positive nervousness from a weak-minded lover. Her unstructed imagination is continually furbishing up a hero or a knight, without fear and without reproach, one of a well-cut coat or a curling mustache, and she is filled with a noble scorn of everyday people who eat their dinners and commute on ruinous trains. And so we see every season the desirable men thrown over for the scrap-graces, and very likely the truest gentleman of your acquaintance rejected for a dancing master.

But besides these normal and legitimate disadvantages, GILBERT labored under one of the other. Mrs. Joignet, the aunt and guardian of his Hesperides, approved of his suit. Not only that, she approved of it noisily, and in as many ill-imagined ways as could well be devised urged it upon her niece. His praises were on her tongue, and his virtues were the burden of her song always. As was to be expected, Nellie detested Gilbert, never spoke to him, if she could help herself, did whatever she did, studied to. Many men would have abandoned such a suit in despair, but Gilbert never even considered such a course. He was very much in love, and he had a habit of success. He waited patiently, and at the end of a reasonable opportunity, as that he had found his opportunity. Mrs. Joignet was ill of a beneficent fever. She was not in danger, but she was bed-fast. As the family physician, and neighbor, it was his duty now to visit at her house twice a day. And with the field clear, he reasoned, what might not be accomplished?

So, though always alert, he came up the walk on his third visit to Mrs. Joignet with a step so elastic that you would have said the man had come into a fortune. And as often happened, he was kicking his heels in the hall, when, he had set his foot on the lower step, Nellie's little maid came hastily out of the door, changed color on seeing him, cast a quick glance at the baker's man, and slipped a letter that she was swinging between her fingers into one of her little apron pockets.

Now the envelope was dainty, and bore a monogram. Gilbert had a hawk's eye, and was sure of that. This fact pointed straight at Nellie as the only creature in the house capable of such eagerness. Then, on the other side, he had often heard it distinctly stated that Nellie had no correspondents, and the maid's manner was half defiant and wholly contraband. She came on toward the Doctor demurely enough, only one corner of the note showing above her ruffles, and looked at him with a bashful and innocent eye till she was well past, and then she nudged the baker's man, who dawdled interminably, as if though it was done so quickly that Gilbert never could have sworn to it, he knew well enough that the letter had slipped into her pocket in a sham's; and it might be the most commonplace note ever written. But his lover's instinct told him it was something of the sort, but a love-letter, a surreptitious letter, and a direct blow at him! He waited for the girl to come back, but she avoided him, going around by the shrubbery. Gilbert was a man not to be easily balked and quick to decide, and he held council with himself then and there over a twinkling honeysuckles. The letter was Nellie's; and it was sent slyly, not by any of the channels that might be called legal—the gardener, the coachman, or any tried and trusted servant. Mrs. Joignet was ill in bed, and Nellie was a romantic child, educated in seclusion, whose first independent move was about sure to prove a mistake. He would have that letter! Sam was preparing a pair of horses to drive to catechism, but running after him, Gilbert ordered him to stop.

All this happened on a pleasant May morning, while Nellie was twittering about in her room overhead, not ready yet to leave her nest. She heard Sam's wheels roll away, and congratulated herself with heightening color, "He has got my letter. Then she tried one how and another that, but could not succeed in getting her feet among her braids. Dr. Gilbert would be at breakfast, but that was no reason why one should look like a fright. And then she remembered, with a lower, her little slippers glancing in and out, on purpose to bewilder Dr. Gilbert, I suppose, who was the lover and the only man under the sun to entirely reverence, passed into the breakfast-room. She had always the advantage! Even the disciple of iron had melted at the sight of her. She could never be master of himself in her presence. Even with her letter in his pocket he must stop and catch his breath and recall to his own weakness before he could follow her.

There are dining-rooms that look as if dining were thrust upon them, and others of which dinner or any other good meal seems only the natural consequence. Mrs. Joignet's was the latter. Gilbert's dinner room. It looked over a lawn, it caught glimpses of a flower-garden, it had a wide view of country, and it was the coolest room in the morning sun; and on this day, as balmy as June, it was full of the fragrance of apple-blossoms, and vocal with the low of cattle coming up through the open glass doors, as though it were midsummer. How full of delicious sweetness might the hour prove! Gilbert had been accustomed for the first time he was alone with the woman he loved, and she sat as he hoped to see her one day sit at his own table. Then his heart always swelled at the thought there laid upon it, like a stone, that letter addressed to REED WILLIAMS—a college student, a new arrival, a man of reference to Nellie's friends, shallow-eyed, thin-legged, trustless, faithless, a puppy! That was how Gilbert, a judge of men, described the offending note. And with this puppy corresponded in secret, through the baker's boy, that pink and white piece of innocence opposite whom he wished to make his wife.

Gilbert sipped his coffee in solemn silence, and revolved to think of it.

Nellie, who had expected that Gilbert would resume upon their breakfast, and had prepared to repulse him with great dignity, now that he did not presume was offended. She looked at him from time to time, but kept her eyes on his plate. She trifled with her chop, and sipped at her cream, and felt her wrath grow too much for her.

"I am sorry to leave you," she said; "but if you will excuse me I think I had better go see my aunt;" and on this she pushed back her chair. Gilbert rose also. He had studied for the last hour for a way to tell her what he had discovered, and he had not found it. How should he begin? He took out her letter and held it toward her.

"Stop," he said. "I wish to speak with you —about this. I have not read it. Is this your letter?" Somehow, he had cherished an impossible hope that it was not hers, after all.

"My letter!" echoed Nellie. At first she was positively terrified. She had never broken out of bounds before. She had always been kept under Gilbert's eye. But to this instinctive terror succeeded instantly bitter disappointment and more bitter anger. "It had not got her letter after all, and thanks to Dr. Gilbert." She drew herself up and eyed him with a kindling glance. "Yes, it is my letter! What have you to do with your hands?"

"What a dagger which you aimed at your own breast would be doing there," answered Gilbert, huskily, feeling that now only had he got full force of the blow.

"A fine phrase!" cried Nellie, turning away with a little scornful laugh. "And it means, I suppose, that you are going to read my letters and enves-dropper. Well, I do thank you. It was gallantly done, and like a gentleman!"

Gilbert stared, and waited, but she made no answer. To the woman who called him spy he could offer no other reply than silence. Nellie went on toward the door, and then stopped suddenly and came back.

"What are you going to do with it?" she asked, in a hurt, angry voice. "Had you not better show it to my aunt? The prevention of her sermons most always be Dr. Gilbert's virtues, but she will have a new text. It will vary the monotony at least."

A slight curving of upper answered her as he held it burning at arm's-length. Involuntarily she exclaimed; and then, furious with herself, bit her lips while she watched it burn.

"I never intended to show it to your aunt," he said, quietly.

Nellie looked up at him with a cruel smile.

"Thank you. It is an ill wind that blows no one good; and though it is not pleasant to have one's letters burned, I think I should be grateful to you—for giving me such good reason to hate you. Before—I felt—that it was a little unreasonable."

Gilbert gather'd his charred ash in his hand, and let it float out of window, as if he had not heard her.

"So far," he said, "your fair name is safe."

"My fair name!" she repeated, coloring. "But I can write more."

Gilbert shrugged his shoulders.

"And I give you my word that I will, and that I will send them if I can."

"And I give you mine," he rejoined, as cool as she was vehement, "that I shall try to prevent you."

"Do I?" flashed Nellie; "and where I would have sent one I will send a dozen."

Gilbert took up his hat.

"That must be as you choose, Nellie; and that you may have time to begin, good-morning."

Then he went away with some small show of victory, knowing well that his temper, and the feeling that a defeat would have been much more desirable. The woman he loved had called him spy and enves-dropper, and he told himself that he had brought it about by his brutal blundering. No sooner did Fate show an intention of interfering than he was about to make a fool in the matter, and where he was at least tolerated get himself detested. In short, Dr. Gilbert arrived at the conclusion that he was a donkey and an idiot, and deserved what he got.

Meantime, what with the impetus that Gilbert had lent it, and with its own natural progression, Nellie's little flirtation had blossomed into a romance. It was generally understood between these two young people that they were the victims of a Causless Tyranny, in large capitals, and felt for each other an Unfailing Affection, in the same type. As others were accustomed through the butcher and the baker, though there was no reason why they should not have written the post-office. All through that beneficent fever, from which Gilbert had hoped so much, they met, in the village store, on the bridge, in the orchard, at last, grown bolder, in the library itself. All the village was in the secret, though these young people were convinced that they were managing their affairs with consummate prudence. All the village, except Mrs. Joignet herself, for Mrs. Joignet was not a gossip, and she had no hint of it. No one would have ventured to tell her except Gilbert; and for certain reasons, which he knew clearly, he had preferred to keep his discoveries to himself.

But Dr. Gilbert's grounds adjoined those of Mrs. Joignet's, and he was ready, or his patient, one twilight after another, he had watched the lovers walking in the orchard, or paced his own fields near enough to catch the murmur of their voices in the library; and one evening, walking in this way in bitterness of spirit, an idea came to him. I say more than he became I do not believe that we manufacture ideas, and it was as if some one had whispered to him the suggestion which he had been searching for hours to find in vain. He went to the back of Mrs. Joignet's house where he saw one of the maids.

"Tell Mrs. Joignet," he said, "that Dr. Gilbert would like to see her in the library." Then he went around the house, and instead of going in at stationed himself under the window where Nellie and Mr. Williams were sitting.

Mrs. Joignet came down to the library, and opening the door found the niece and a stranger. A dim-legged young gentleman, with black mustache and eyes, and a fashionable coat. Nellie just observing that "she heard a noise, and supposed somebody should come," looked up, saw her aunt, and presented her guest; and Mr. Williams, just about to reassure her, seeing Mrs. Joignet rigid and glaring at him, began to feel that he should be the one in need of reassurance him.

Just then stepped in Dr. Gilbert, and Nellie concluded that her hour had come.

There was a strange observer, of the avenger in Dr. Gilbert's manner. He saluted Mrs. Joignet in the everyday fashion, and then, as if first observing the young gentleman,

"His Miss Nellie not introduced Mr. Williams? But I dare say she hardly has his name in mind, so much has she had to occupy herself and pronounce me, meaning to follow almost directly, but I was detained on the way. Permit me? Miss Joignet, Mr. Reed Williams, son of my old friend Dr. Williams of Providence."

Nellie, who had shut her eyes tight when Gilbert commenced speaking, now broke. Was she man crazy, or was she? She looked at Williams, a pitiable spectacle, as he subsumed before Mrs. Joignet. He was evidently the son of Gilbert's old tutor, and had a speaking acquaintance with the Doctor; but he had avoided him, as the prince naturally avoids the tutor's relentless ogre, who is trying to rob him of his princess. And he had believed Gilbert was an ogre. It was impossible that he intended in honesty and kindness to rescue him from the consequences of his own folly. Gilbert was over-trap hidden, and was listening for the snap while he was trying to smile on Mrs. Joignet. He had neither the pluck nor discovery to see the trap-hidden, and seized the opening offered him. He sat there gasping, and red, and at all possible angles, before Gilbert, sensing at his ease, and I dare say not sorry to show the girl who had thrown him over for a neat little nose and a trim coat, of how much use was a nose and a coat in an emergency that needed wit and spirit. Nellie reddened, and came herself to the rescue. If Williams could not fill the gap she could! But then why does a woman think afterward of the lover whose retreat she is obliged to cover? And she was obliged besides to confess to herself a certain angry admiration for Gilbert, though she looked dauntlessly into his eyes, as who should say, "Strike when you please; I shall not ask for mercy."

Gilbert only smiled back at her. He might mean to crush them ultimately, but no thunderbolts were in that night. To the last he was jesting and genial, and Reed Williams and Dr. Gilbert went away together.

Now when these two gentlemen stepped out into the night together, came, I dare say, the most difficult moment of either for the unhappy Williams, who felt that he must say something, more especially as Gilbert was silent. They walked in this manner a street or two, and that necessity for saying something increased. Williams began:

"Dr. Gilbert, I don't understand the part you are playing; but I am very much obliged to you. I was in a deuce of a scrape."

Gilbert took him up promptly.

"Mr. Williams, if you do not understand the part I am playing, you should do so. You are interested in Miss Joignet. That is of very little consequence to me. But Miss Joignet is interested in you; that is of very great consequence to me. And your interest in her is disinclination, because I dare say she has told you that her aunt will oppose you; which is probable also. The matter is delicate and delicate to handle, because Miss Joignet is willful and ignorant, and with the best possible intentions her aunt is the last person to whom intervention it can be confided. I have taken it in my own hands. Miss Joignet will see you. If prevented she would conduct herself by ekpe with you. She shall see you; but as her well-wisher, I choose that it shall be in her own drawing-room and under the observation of her aunt. To that end I brought about your intruduction, and by introducing you made myself responsible for you. Having done so much for you, as far as your behavior to Miss Joignet is concerned, responsible to me. Good-night, Sir."

This was completely all and then the gentleman went on his way. But Nellie's active imagination pictured to her a very different denouement. She saw Gilbert, before the house window, craning her pretty little head out into the darkness, she listened breathlessly for sounds of a scuffle or a struggle. Gilbert, she told herself, was a terrible man: and she had been blind indeed when she thought him conquered. He had not made his revenge easy. It offered itself. Might it not be that he waited for a more terrible revenge? If she heard any thing she should rush out. Aunt Joignet could not keep her. If Williams should be killed for her sake, she would fall on her knees beside him, and kiss him, if the trouble vitals were there; somewhere that Catherine Glover, you know, when she rushed to the house of Hal of the Wynd; and as she pictured the tremendous scene to herself she heard herself trembling very much, and holding hard by the window-sill. But when half an hour passed and she had heard nothing more alarming than the croak of an occasional frog, she began, if the truth must be told, to find herself very sleepy, and decided to go to bed. And though she expected to be restless and anxious, her seventeen years were too much for her, and she slept, not the sleep of the just, for saints often enjoy nothing better than "cat-naps," but the sleep of a good digestion.

But in the morning she was prepared again to do herself and the occasion justice. Her eyes were heavy and red when she woke herself, speechodically, "Oh, has he killed Reed?" and, by dint of supposing various horrible possibilities, worked herself into such a true state of nervousness that, meeting Gilbert in the hall, she felt her worst fears confirmed by his early presence.

"You have killed him," she exclaimed, faintly; "and you have come to tell me of it."

Gilbert looked astonished, and then his eyes glanced with fun.

"Killed who, Nellie? I am here because your aunt had a slight relapse and sent for me; and if you must be told, I would say that Reed Williams was about to say Snap; but feeling that would jar on his melodramatic little listener, changed his tune.

"My poor child," he said, taking her cold hand; "why do you imagine terrible things and frighten yourself with hobgoblins? Have you never understood me? It is true," and his eyes grew dark with feeling; "I have loved you, Nellie, and I cannot help think I could have made you happy. Some men love a woman for her bloom, and some think it desirable to take a wife, and I do one. Not many women are born as I loved you, wholly, truly, tenderly—for yourself."

His voice trembled, and he waited; then went on more calmly:

"But you have made your choice. No matter what I think of it, it is your choice. And now, what can one do for the dearest friend who is dead, Nellie? Wash over those he loved? That is what I have undertaken to do. To guard the object of my dead love. You are all unconscious of the perils you are in, but I am not. I know that honorable men do not visit the women they love by stealth. So I have opened the way for your lover, and will try to keep the foes both with your aunt. And now that I have laid away my presumptuous hopes, can we not be friends?"

He held out his hand. Nellie hesitated.

"First, I should like to say something to you," she said, blushing deeper and red. "When I was so angry the other day, I called you spy and enves-dropper. I did not think you were—in my heart—and I was sorry afterward. And now—I think you are noble, and—I should like you to forgive me."

"There is nothing to forgive," answered Gilbert, but he said it a little coldly; and though he pressed her hand, it was in a lukewarm fashion; and then he went away and left Nellie with a sense of mortification and discomfiture strong upon her. Perhaps she had felt hitherto that she had inherited Gilbert's love, and was sure of it. And now he talked of his "dead love;" and was not she who dismissed him, but he who relinquished her to a rival he disdained; and just as she had commenced to entertain for him a had desired a hero, and a romance, and here was a hero who was going to do "what he could for her;" and a man whom he had never even called by the nose the night before. I am afraid that Nellie was capricious.

Still Gilbert was proud also, and when the prince came, with the full approval of every body, she did her best to play her part; but the effort forced her. The spirit and interest of the affair was gone, and it was flat, and wearied her. It was the mutual fright, the quiver, lest they should be discovered, that made those meetings so delicious. Now that there were no interjections and listenings and bird twitterings to fill up the sentences, Mr. Williams had little enough to say. In short, the stupidity, if I must write the word, of her heart's treasure, drove Nellie beside herself; and then she burst out on him sharply, and instantly repented and tried to be patient, and then was sharp again, till Mr. Williams began to think her temper at least uncertain. He grew sulky, retorted, they quarreled, and parted; and Nellie had never been happy or happy to do what came as when he left her forever.

But the nervous worry of it all had been great; and between it and a cold Nellie fell ill. She was not violently ill, and yet she did not rally. Gilbert was very solicitous, necessarily, because they had promised friendship, there was something very like coolness between the two; for, seeing that it was mental trouble that weighed on and weak, he concluded, with some secret anger, that she pined after Mr. Williams for all. While she lay ill, she had heard that Mr. Williams visited Betty Payson—the worst temper and the finest complexion in the county! So she fretted for Gilbert's coming, and when he came she only spoke to him. His first and last thought was of her; yet he treated her with distance.

But nothing is here one day by habit that she had been crying. He was very conscious that he had engineered the catastrophe that had befallen her in the affair, and the tears of pity for her poor pale cheeks smote him to the heart. If she was worrying for that puppy she should have the puppy back again, cost what it might, he said to himself, and he taxed her with crying. "But no; she had not been crying. There was nothing the matter," and he began to chatter and laugh. Gilbert was not to be fooled.

"Nellie," he said, seriously, "why will you not trust in me? You are miserable, and medicine can not help you. Tell me your trouble. It is—Gilbert was going to say his love, but he preserved bravely. "It is it—about that man?"

Nellie looked up at him with a quick, startled glance, and there are looks that speak more than words. And the unconscious reproach in which her head was bent and her hand was laid upon her brow, and his own look lighted. He came to her and took her hand, and she did not try to withdraw them, though her cheeks glowed with a deep blush.

"My darling," murmured Gilbert, "I told you once my love was dead. That was false. Will you have it now, dear? I never loved you so well."

Nellie made no audible answer; but entering a moment later, Mrs. Joigest saw a wonderful tableau—Mr. Gilbert with his arm around Nellie, and her head nestling confidingly on his shoulder!

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

MEETINGSOS and extraordinary events are becoming so common nowadays that we almost cease to wonder at any thing. Still belief is sometimes scarcely possible. A singular case is reported in the Spanish journals, which is exciting much attention. There is a young girl twenty years of age living in Cuenca-thenshire, Wales, who has taken no food since October 20, 1867; nor has she swallowed water or any other fluid since December of the same year. She is, at least, are the statements made concerning her. She was a healthy girl until February, 1868, when she had an attack of scarlatina; since then she has been confined to her bed. For a few weeks she took some light food, but of late her desire for it gradually left her. Occasionally a little water is applied to her lips; but often many days pass without this being done. During her illness she lost her hair, but it has since grown long. She is not emaciated, and looks healthy, though delicate. She sleeps well at night, but does not sleep during the day: is cheerful in disposition; but is subject to occasional attacks of unconsciousness.

A Paris paper has a new column headed "Broken English." Japanese who get "mashed" on the Atlantic coal collisions, or who financially come to grief, are placed in that column.

Reporters and gossips disagree. Some say reciprocidonamia is spreading; others declare the fever has had its run. On the one hand, a quantity of discarded bicycles have been sold for a song; there was a boom in Nassau Street; on the other hand, a party of Prince Napoleon's side-de-camps have come back from Nice to Villafranca on water velocipedes. So each one may draw his own inferences. The instrumentand machines, by-the-way, consist of two miniature parallel canoes, which support a sort of chair; the paddle-wheel, placed between the canoes, is propelled by the feet only, and is covered like the paddle-wheel of a steamer, to protect the driver from the water it throws up.

Several new inventions in the velocipede line are announced; the "rocking-chair" velocipede, a three-wheeled vehicle, whose name is indicative of the requisite propelling motion; a one-wheeled affair, propelled by five men, who occupy comfortable seats on the automatic horse; a four-wheeled machine, which will carry a lady and her carpet-bag, in addition to the driver; and so on, ad infinitum.

The new Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate is distressed—so "they say." His feelings are "kept on edge," and this is the direct reason why every time he discharges an official woman come to his office and "cry." Sets the dogs to barking, and so again. They cry in relays, taking turns for each other.

In "The Maxy Archipelago," recently published by Carter & Brothers, the author describes a novel fruit, called the Durion. It is about the size of a cocoanut, green in color, and the thick rind covered with sharp spines. On being cut open, the fruit is disclosed, filled with a cream-colored pulp, the flavor of which is indescribable. Arthur Helps discoursed highly of and with almonds gives the best general idea of it, but intermingled with it some waffs of flavor that call to mind cream-cheese, pineapples, brown sherry, and other incongruities. It is neither acid, nor sweet, nor spicy, but combines the want of none of these qualities, so it is perfect as it is. It possesses no sinews or other bad effect, and the more you eat of it the less you are inclined to stop. Yet under the durion is an excellent vegetable. It is preserved in large quantities, salted, but then it acquires an odor disagreeing to Europeans, although the Dyaks appreciate it as a relish with their rice.

Very sad was the death of Mrs. Stillman, wife of the United States Consul at Crete. She has been living in her devotion to the cause of suffering Crete during the recent insurrection, and her son and her husband were regarded with the deepest affection by the Cretan families. But a strange, melancholy malaria overpowered her, and she died suddenly in April she was found in a retired part of her house, wrapped in a shawl, lying upon the floor, dead, but yet warm, and the fatal cup at her side, whose contents had caused her instantaneous death. A few lines written by her revealed the fatal secret—it was the felt she was useless, an injury to her friends, and had better die. A dreadful suspicion and a tragic ending to a life which had been full of blessing to others. The funeral services, conducted by Dr. Jonas King, were most impressive, and the sympathy of another was borne to her last resting-place on the shoulders of the Christian Cretans, Greeks, Americans—and none more truly so than the crowds of Cretan refugees.

Last week a convention of the working-women of Boston and vicinity met in the vestry-room of Tremont Temple, under the auspices of "The Working People's Industrial Club." The object of the meeting was closed in regard to the difficulties women experience in obtaining employment, and the wages they receive in many cases. One chief object of the convention was to use all lawful means to obtain for laborers unexpected and honest reward. It is to be regretted that the name of the "Industrial Order" be changed to "The World's Land, Labor, and Liberty League."

Don't jump with your neighbor. If you have just been published to prove that this habit is a fruitful cause of disease, idiocy, and death. The author asserts that an open mouth during sleep lets in an envoy that chills the lungs, racks the brain, paralyzes the stomach, and heralds the approach of headache, toothache, rheumatism, dyspepsia, and the gout!

The Neapolitans were rather shocked a few weeks ago to find their streets covered with red, and their garments spotted with sanguinary looking drops. A shower of red dust specks had been drawn up by the hot from African deserts, borne with it by the wind across the Mediterranean. This is not an unprecedented phenomenon. Another shower of insects fell at Ancona, in Savoy, last January, which, upon examination, proved to be of a species peculiar to the forests of Central France; and a few years back Malta was visited by millions of avers of a fly found nowhere but in the island of Sicilinda.

When the new hospital is completed which is now being erected on the corner of Lexington Avenue and Forty-second Street and the "Old Ladies' Home for the Relief of the Ruptured and Crippled," two hundred crippled children will be received as in-door patients, medically treated, educated, and provided with all essential comforts free of charge, although many will require for their treatment expensive surgical appliances. There, it is hoped, however, will restore them to self-sustaining ability in the future, and save them from a life of dependence upon charity. Those who will also be dispensed to the indigent afflicted adults all the requisite surgical appliances, thus enabling them to labor for the support of themselves and their families.

The Sun tells a very good story of Judge Francis, editor of the Troy Times. As he was sauntering down Broadway one afternoon he was suddenly accosted by a black-haired gentleman, who grasped his hand warmly by the hand and said: "General, I do assure you, Sir, before God, that this is one of the happiest moments of my life. My heart is filled with gratitude to Him that I am permitted to thus grasp you by the hand. God bless you, Sir! I pray that you may continue to live!"

Judge Francis was slightly staggered at this salutation; but before he could express his thanks the fervent gentleman continued:

"You can not conceive, Sir, the warmth of my feelings toward you. I do not know, Sir, that ever we met in the city of New York, and if I dared do it, I would tear the hot from my head, and give them room to throw flowers for old General Lee—the grand old 'Uncle Robert' of the Army of Virginia. Yes, General; yes, Sir, I would—before God, I would!"

So saying the enthusiastic Confederate wound his arms about Judge Francis, and kissed him twice on the right cheek. He then grasped the General by the hand, and swept up Broadway with tears in his eyes.

The Judge looked like one bewildered for some moments; then, turning to a friend, he said: "Well, I declare this beats all. I have frequently been mistaken for Edwin M. Stanton, but never before for General Robert E. Lee."

Francis II., ex-King of Naples, has rent Prince Louis de Bourbon an apartment in his palace. The latter has accompanied by a threat of excommunication from the family of somewhere who bear the name of Bourbon. It will be remembered that Prince Louis came to this country not many weeks ago for the purpose of consummating his marriage with Miss De Hamel, and that after some difficulties the young couple were pronounced man and wife. Prince Louis is said to be very well able to manage his own affairs, and is not likely to be disturbed by the protest.

It is related of Lord Brougham as an inveterate smoker, as well as exceedingly wanting in punctuality in meeting his engagements. He often ordered a cup of tea and smoked a cigar after the audience, who were waiting for him, had become impatient. One day Liszt was to play at a court concert in Vienna. He went to the imperial palace and was told the performances would commence at once. He took a cigar and lighted it, but was informed that no one was ever permitted to smoke in the imperial apartments. "Then," said Liszt, "I shall go down to the courtyard and smoke my cigar there." He soon, however, had no heard that this was forbidden also than he went down to the carriage and took a drive through the streets of the city. In the carriage he smoked three cigars and forgot all about the concert. Upon reaching his hotel he was waited on by his excited manager that the whole court had been waiting for him for over an hour.

Young ladies in Minnesota "seem to have entered into a new business. A St. Paul paper says that the other day two young ladies from the country brought to market thirty thousand frogs which they had themselves taken. They sold them for fifteen cents a dozen.

It is reported that the village of "Yon Bet," in California, has been destroyed by fire. It is to be hoped that when the "Yon Bet" people locate themselves again they will have the good sense to choose a more reasonable name for their abiding-place.

Missionaries in China conduct religious services under difficulties of a peculiar and oftentimes a ludicrous nature. One of the people come into the meetings, go out during services, and full asleep under the most impressive discourses, but they interrupt the exercises in a manner that may be safe and sure in their directions. Not long ago a man came running into a religious meeting with a solid expression on his countenance, and the minister who wished to make room for a man who had been frightened to death. The interrupted preacher took the necessary directions, and proceeded with his remarks. Before the sermon was out the military marshals of the province happened to pass along the street in front of the chapel, and the congregation tumbled pell-mell into the street.

Mr. Stewart's new model hotel for working-women is to contain a library, a reading-room, and a large parlor for social uses. The food furnished in the restaurant will be at the cost price, and it is estimated that an inmate may live abundantly well—washing, room rent, and food included—for about two dollars a week. The enterprise, if successful, will be followed by the building of a similar dwelling for young men.

The busy city of Lynn made during the year 1868 about nine millions of shoes. The great majority of the shoe business is the isle of Lynn: and in a recent number of the Lynn Reporter a correspondent desires liberty to lower his prices! He says that if the manufacturers are allowed to reduce the wholesale cost of their shoes twenty-five per cent. the fortunes of their citizens will be secured, and the working people of the country will be the gainers of their hard wages from six to eight millions of dollars a year. This seems an extravagant statement; but the writer goes on to state that if the duties were taxes on leather and not on goring were reduced, manufacturers would be able to put good shoes into the market at a lower price.

CAN NOT

I.

You can not do it. Take the Turner there,
The costliest treasure of your costly walls,
Where, through the pearly veil of mountainair
The cheesy radiance of the rainbow falls,
Carry it to your "artist" and bid him force
The very sun his cunning work to do,
And bid him, for your pleasure and ease,
Again the lovely wonder to renew.

II.

Nay, for he can not do it. What avails
That every month in rushing order stands?
Each cosy flue of graceful form is there,
Vivid and fresh, as from the master's hands?
The glow and life of it all is gone,
The tender instre of the tints is fled;
Dumb and dismayed we look, as those who gaze
On the pale features of their darling, dead.

III.

And so we can not do it. What avails
The loving tone to woody grouse fled,
The long familiar clasping of the hands,
The gracious head in sweet old fashion bent?
The voice rises jarred and strained, the brilliant smile
May light the lips, but never reach the eyes;
Broke the old chords as deftly as you will,
In hollow dissonance the echo dies.

IV.

Ah, leave the place hanging in its niche,
Leave the last passion in its nameless grave,
Though o'er the canvas Time's slow rain creep,
Though on the sunlit sward the henlocks wave,
Better forgetfulness than empty misses,
Attempts that nothing but decay can prove—
The ghastly mockery of a thing that were.
The cold blank photograph, the ghost of love.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE WAY TO OBTAIN A CHEAP BATH—Stand in a shower of rain.

About twelve o'clock one night recently a solitary individual stood upon the banks of the Mississippi River, opposite Edgeworth, in the outskirts of that remantic village, the late terminus of the Missouri Valley Railroad, commonly called "Hoboken." Practically did he shout till the owner of a small skiff was aroused from his slumbers, and seating a big flask dressed himself, manned his skiff, and rowed over to the Missouri shore, where the following conversation took place:

BOATMAN. "What do you want?"

MAN ON SHORE. "Want to get across."

BOATMAN. "Who are you?"

MAN. "Want to go to Kansas City."

BOATMAN. "Who are you?"

MAN. "Railroad contractor."

BOATMAN. "What's your name?"

MAN. "John Brodder."

BOATMAN. "Then you are the man who laid the track on the extension of the Missouri Valley Railroad to Kansas City."

MAN. "Yes."

BOATMAN. "Well, there is an engine just fixing up to go down. Why don't you go on that?"

MAN. "No, Sir! I laid that track; and I'm d—d if I am going to be the first man to ride over it."

He was fished over.

PSYCHOLOGICAL. The state of mind that man is in who risks largely in a lottery, and does not draw a prize, may be described as Blank Despair.

LEGAL WIT.

Q. How can a man be legally delivered from his debt without paying it?—A. By marrying his creditor.

Q. In what class of personality by the common usage of society does mere possession without right draw to it the right of property?—A. Umbrellas, over-coats, and law-books.

Q. Why is repeated cursing a good defense in an action of debt?—A. By reason of the rule of law "that a man shall not be twice vexed for one and the same cause."

Q. Why may lawyers always be indicted?—A. For the reason they are property to be classed as Suspects (Sus. per coll.), together with highwaymen, thieves, etc. "Stand and deliver."

Q. What is the office of Estoppel the worst foe to the profession?—A. Because it puts an end to litigation.

Q. Why is there substantial reason to believe that the Atlantic Cable to make effect in a short time will lead mournful lives?—A. Because from the Cymbals will be heard their doleful sounds.

A very base old maid who always knew every body else's business better than her own, although she by no means knew enough of that, was at last upon a dying condition. At this stage she articulated to her maid, who was in attendance, "Give me a drink." Then a knock was heard; the maiden lady was forgotten in a very sound in the neighborhood—"Who's at number thirty." "A woman setting pipe," replied her sister. "Yes! yes!" gasped the expiring virgin: "what do they want with pies?—they had pies Sunday yesterday." With this the maiden drew her last breath.

Paris has in her midst a generous miser, about whom the Figaro relates the following anecdote: He met the other day a little street-harper, who begged him to give him something. "Give me a sou, my kind Sir!" "I have no change." The little harper regarded the miser sadly. "Let me see, could I owe you something?" After a moment's reflection his face brightened, and he said joyously: "Nobody shall say that I allowed a poor boy to pass by without giving him something." So saying he offered the boy a pinch of snuff.

"ANSWERS TO A LIFE INSURANCE AGENT.

How long have you known John Jones?—Since two years after I was born.

Had are his general health?—Pretty good, until he got his head broke in summer, a straw fell across it on one side, and sunburn tweezers, very loose in the jaw.

Do you regard him as temperate?—Nobody shall say that I allowed a poor boy to pass by without giving him something." So saying he offered the boy a pinch of snuff.

Has he ever had any serious illness?—Yes, he had a fever and ague.

How long since?—Let me see, it was before I was born.

Has he ever had fever and ague?—Had a fever last summer when he was teething, and a chest.

Do you call his lungs sound?—No, I call them inflated air tubes.

How old is he?—Old enough to know more than he does.

Does he smoke or chew?—He smokes when he chooses.

Is he of steady habits?—Yes, he is agent for Fairbanks's scales and balances.

What is his height?—That depends upon the thickness of his boots.

Has he children?—Yes, two nephews.

Epitaph on Professor Walker, who wrote a treatise on English Particles:

"Here lies Walker's Particles."

On Dr. Fuller:

"Here lies Fuller's earth."

On a dustman:

"Come to lament his change, ye Just,
Who deal of worthless things in trust,
Here lies two bales of dust."

The following is a quaint mixture of specific information and comfort:

"Here lies two babes as dead as life,
Who died of opposite diseases;
They were too good to live with we,
And too bad for heaven to please."

A GIRL'S A GIRL FOR A' THAT.

Is there a lady in the land
That's ashamed to own a' that?
With scornful eye we pass her by,
And little care for a' that;
For Nature's charms shall bear the palm—
A girl's a girl for a' that.

What though her neck with snow she deck,
With folly's gear and a' that,
And put to rout her virtuous pride:
We can dispense with a' that;
An honest heart can act a part
A girl's a girl for a' that.

The noble dame we proudly scorn,
A lowly lass and a' that;
A pretty face has more grace
Than haughty looks and a' that:
A bonnie maid needs no such aid—
A girl's a girl for a' that.

Then let us trust that come it must,
And I will for it a' that,
When faith and love, all arts above,
Shall reign supreme and a' that,
And every youth confess the truth—
A girl's a girl for a' that.

There is something naive in our countryman's reply to the European traveler when asked whether he had ever crossed the Alps: "I can not tell you off hand; give me a minute to the circumstance, I believe I did pass rising" ground a good deal."

When the "pledge" was being circulated at a temperance meeting a decidedly inebriated individual presented himself and affixed his signature with the chairman remarked, "This is a very important step, my friend, and I trust you realize it." "Perfectly well you are assuming." "Oh, I can stand the (hic) pressure," was the response; "I've done it lots of times before."

SHE NEVER SMILED AGAIN.

She never smiled again! Her love
Were never wreathed with dimples merry;
Her pretty mouth and cheeks would move
And she looked melancholy—very.

She never smiled again, her face
From that sad hour was cold as grimly;
Nor sign of joy yet there could trace,
But sigh and sorrow shadowed dimly.

She never smiled again: beneath
Their cruel power what griefs restrained her?
She'd been a martyr to—toothache—
But oh, it was not they that pained her.

For she had lovers not a few;
Ay, one by one her joys they quitted;
'Twas then her heart was broken true,
She went to get her mouth refitted.

And certain wicked dentists had
(I think it right the world should know it)
Put in a set so false and bad,
She never smiled at all, poor poet.

Some old bachelor who, no doubt, had a "flat" in his ear, thus speaks of a pretty woman's "laughing eyes:"

"Of all the devils under the skies,
Deceitful and false and bad,
Devils clothed in angelic guise,
A genie woman with laughing eyes
Is the greatest devil of them all."

"ERROR WOUNDED WRITHES IN PAIN."

JOHN BULL. "Did you mean to step on my Corns?"
BROTHER JONATHAN. "YES, SIR. And if you don't pay me what you ought I'll grind your Corns for you, and swell that other Foot bigger yet!"

REMEMBERED.

Have you forgotten it? I never can!
One blessed night in June,
How bright the sky, how pale your face,
In the wan light of the moon.
Do you remember it? For, oh, I do!—
The scent of flowers there:
Was it the buds upon the trees,
Or the great rose in your hair?

Have you forgotten it? I never can!
Something I risked that night;
Something I scarcely dared to speak,
Though my heart said I was right.
Do you remember it? For, oh, I do!
The first, sweetest kiss;
Lift up your face, look in my eyes,
It was such as this—and this!

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY.

CHAPTER II.

AZALEA IS TRANSPLANTED.

"Go away from father! leave Topaz behind her! leave the garden, and her rooms, and the apple-loft!" For a while Azalea's heart seemed convulsed with sorrow, then succeeded rage. She wouldn't go away and leave dear father. She hated the strange man who had brought her such woe. She would kick and scratch him next time she saw him." But when she met him again her heroism had evaporated, and she merely stood and glowered sullen defiance.

"You shall ride a pony, and have new books." Azalea's face softened imperceptibly. "You can come home when you like." She sobs checked, and only a convulsive gurgle was left agitating the throat. "And you will have my little girls to play with."

Azalea thought for a little while, with her finger in her mouth; then, with a dumped, smeared face, she confessed: to George Moore that she should like to see the little girls; and so Lord Orme was victor. For another half-day passed away it was settled that she and her new preceptor should leave Essex, on that same evening, on their way to Lord Orme's house at Brighton.

It was with a bitter pang in her heart that George Moore watched the two depart. When he turned to re-enter his now solitary home he felt solitude for the night of the first time, the tendence of which had given him so many happy hours. He looked with yet more intense distaste at the shabby room—the vacant chair where Azalea usually sat. Now that the house was void of her dear presence a solemn pathos seemed to be attached to the several evidence of her childish occupations. If Topaz had only been left to blink on the worn-out hearth-rug, and bark mysteriously at nothing, he would only be human. He would have been some comfort; but Topaz had accompanied his small mistress, and George Moore was in his present very sad and lonely mood, hating the silence of the night, but still more hating the thought of the next morning, that would have very little to him, since will in life might not greet Azalea's little face.

Azalea was very silent during her journey to London. She wept at first when she thought of daddy, with no one to make his tea; and then she assisted her conscience by vowing she would perform acts of unusual tenderness and devotion to him when she returned home.

"I'll look after my new books, and I'll tell him all about the little girls," she thought. She thus partially quieted her conscience, but not entirely; for with all her tears she felt quite of a little secret joy in this expedition, and she was clever enough to know that the pleasure with which we propose to compensate our loved ones for the pain we cause them is generally more agreeable to ourselves in reflection than it is consoling to them.

Lord Orme was also silent. He was an odd mixture of decision and indecision, and he was just now suffering in consequence of his despicable phase of his character. Jonathan Wild bids a man to be wholly good or wholly bad: he asserts that there is no happiness, no peace to be found in the middle road. If Nature, when moulding Lord Orme, had not formed him with a pliant conscience he would have been a happier man.

As he now sat in the railway carriage, with one long companionship with memory, all his girl by his side, he felt just a little doubtful of the success of his project. Rosa and Amelia had never looked so neat in his eyes; their governess, Miss Slater, had never seemed so rigidly particular about hands and feet and general deportment as now, when he was inwardly contrasted them with this unkempt, weird-looking child.

He had written to Miss Slater on the previous day to warn her that the orphan daughter of his old nurse would accompany him on his return home. "The child is living in a lonely house in the country, and I wish to give her a little pleasure for her mother's sake, who was a most attached and faithful servant," he wrote.

Lord Orme had not yet grown strong enough in the exercise of his new-found courage to tell the truth even to his servants. "We'll see how she gets on," he said, apostrophizing Azalea: and while he meditated, and Azalea stared, the train rolled into London.

It was quite late at night when the two arrived at Brighton.

The mysterious moon of the sea, hitherto unknown to her, filled Azalea with a vague sense of awe. "What is it?" she asked. "Why does it hiss so?"

She put her head eagerly out of the carriage window, and looked at the wave rippling in the silver moonlight. "Oh, it is beautiful!" she cried, with a deep indrawn breath; "It's like ever so many moving, shining meadows!"

Lord Orme had ridden and walked for so many years on the cliff that he had forgotten the sea's existence. It was always there, and so he never thought of it. He had thought of many things during his lonely perambulations—of his wife's temper, of his multifarious bills, of his dinner, of his horses, but rarely of the great breadth of waters before him; consequently he was a little disconcerted when Azalea turned on him suddenly with, "Do you ever see Christ walking on the waves?"

"N-n-n-o; what do you mean?" Lord Orme asked, with a slight start.

The child did not answer him; she had turned her face seaward again, her eyes drinking in the wondrous beauty of the scene before her. At Azalea she said to watch the great cloud clouds until her vivid imagination peopled the rosy vapors with bright faces. She had seen Peter the Apostle with his fish-hook bowed on his knee, Mary Magdalen lying abashed in masses of her own fair hair; and through the crowd of spirits came One whom Jonathan Wild still distinctly saw walk on Peter until the shame passed away from his countenance, and who held out His hand to Mary till she rose joyfully and trailed her last tresses after Him, with her hands clasped in adoration. If Azalea had been asked to put these fancies into words she would have been much puzzled. She could not even express to Topaz, who was her usual confidant, all the lovely things she thought she saw, or why they were lovely.

Lord Orme, not yet accustomed to the child's odd questions, looked at her uneasily during the last part of the drive. "I wish she wn't mad," he murmured.

The carriage stopped before a handsome portico, and a stream of light came through the open door of Lord Orme's house as he led Azalea up the flight of steps.

She was dazzled by the light when she got inside the door, and a little scared by the sight of so many tall men with white waistcoats with stockings looking about. When she had space to look round her she could see no little faces, could hear no sound of childish voices.

Lord Orme interpreted rightly the look of disappointment on Azalea's face.

"Come with me, dear," he said, despairately; and taking the child's hand he led her up the richly carpeted stairs into a handsomely furnished room, in which, on a mahogany table with silver and glass, two little creatures seated round the table in high-backed chairs—little creatures who seemed to Azalea, with their white frills, stiff, baby advancing to meet them, a boy standing by the fire swinging a whip in his hand: such was the view picked up by Azalea's observant eyes.

The little girls descended from their seats and tripped gracefully across the room to their father. "Good evening, papa," they said, each, and "Evening, dear papa," echoed the other. The biggest girl looked askance at the battered hat, and the ragged jacket, and the dirty face of her plate, as though fearful that the strange arrival looked no good to the one withered-looking piece of cake left in the dish. Amelia, with her head in answer to Lord Orme's bow, and then looked patronizingly at the hat. For a moment there was no recognition between Azalea, who, not knowing why, felt inclined to weep, Lord Orme pulled his ear—a sure sign that his mind was in a perplexed mind. Miss Slater broke the silence.

"The little girl would like to have some tea, I dare say," she suggested. Azalea eyed the tea-table hungrily, but said nothing.

"I suppose the little creature would prefer her having it in the housekeeper's room."

"I should prefer nothing of the sort," his lord ship said, sharply. "I want the child with me here, or in the drawing-room with me if she will inconvenience you too much here."

Miss Slater looked at Lord Orme's face, noted that the blue eyes met hers with decision, and that the mouth, usually so sweet and irresolute in its expression, was firmly compressed. "Certainly, my lord. Perhaps it would be better," she added, glancing at the empty tea-pot, "to have some fresh tea." The governess's handsome remark was a better-aimed shaft at the new arrival than the first one. Like all his other qualities, Lord Orme's generosity was of a lordly nature. Liberal to extreme on occasions when his generosity was largely roused, he "had a frugal mind" in respect of trifling sums. One of the little peculiarities was an objection to having overmuch tea, sugar, or cream consumed at his table. He would limit them to certain small modicum of these luxuries, and fondly hoped his example was followed by the other inhabitants of Orme House, who, in fact, wasted these articles as lavishly as every thing else. My lord stepped gayly up to the table, poured out a libation for a cold, sullen drop or two of liquid that oozed from the spout as he tilted the tea-pot over it. "Will you have some tea, my dear?" he said. "We shall only require some hot water."

Azalea sat down at table, and was watched with great interest by Rosa and Amelia, who ultimately by Conrad. The latter had nearly made up his mind that the new-comer was "jolly," and was entertaining a high opinion of tavity of communicating to her that conviction. When tea was over, Lord Orme invited Miss Slater to accompany him to the drawing-room.

"I dare say the children will get on better alone," he suggested; "besides which, I should be glad to have a little private conversation with you."

Miss Slater fluttered and smiled. Prim as she was, she could not forget the fact that Lord Orme was now a widower. The door closed, and the brother and sisters were left alone.

Conrad was eleven, Rosa one year older, Amelia was the youngest, and her youthful plumpness of outline contrasted quaintly with the prim dignity displayed in her every-day manner.

"Now, girls, put off your stuck-up airs," Conrad said, rudely. "She's gone, and it's no go humbugging me. Let's have a game with the new girl."

Azalea advanced toward Amelia. "Do show me your dolls and books," she said, eagerly. "Lord Orme tells me you've got such lots of pretty things; and I've never seen but two dolls in my life.

Amelia had a short consultation with Rosa, when Rosa spoke:

"We will show them to you, but you mustn't touch them."

Azalea gave the required pledge, and all four children advanced toward a cupboard where the toys were deposited in order, by command of Miss Slater, who did not permit unseemly confusion to exist even among the dolls' legs and arms.

Azalea sat still for some little while, content to look at the wonders of civilization with which the cupboard was stored; but after a while she found it irksome to see the outside of books she was not allowed to touch, and trying to her feet was not allowed to touch, and trying to her feet-ings to watch the consumption of bonbons which were never offered to herself. Her dullness was broken up, not by the arrival of a winning card side the door, accompanied by a vigorous scratching against the panels.

"Oh! it's my darling! It's Topaz!" cried Azalea, with a gush of tenderness, which was perhaps greater because she was feeling disappointed by her companions. She ran to the door and admitted the terrier, who leaped round her, barking with delight at the reunion. Azalea took the opportunity to hug and pour out some milk for him. Milk was a favorite beverage with Topaz at Auriel: his tail wagged, and his eyes glistened with delight of anticipation.

"Oh! crikey, won't she catch it, just?" cried Conrad, as he watched the unconscious Azalea's proceedings. Rosa frowned, assuming an air of authority, which was in ludicrous imitation of her governess, walked up to Azalea.

"You must not do that—it is very ill-bred."

"Why not?" said Azalea, simply.

"It is not allowed, and, indeed, no dogs are allowed here at all."

Azalea looked at Topaz, and saw that his tail was quivering more than ever.

"I can't desert him," she said.

"He mustn't have it," Rosa repeated, sharply.

"Mustn't he?" retorted ill-bred Azalea, with a sarcastic grin; and the offender instant Topaz was lapping up the contents of the saucer.

"I shall go and complain to Miss Slater," Rosa said, with dignity.

"Pray do," Azalea answered, coolly: "I don't mind what you say to Miss Slater; I don't like her."

"You are a jolly girl," Conrad said, admiringly. "I don't like Miss Slater; she's a beast. Rosa and Amelia like each other, only they're sneaks, and daren't say so. Girls always are sneaks," he added, reflectively, as he flung the lash of his whip at the fire. In the direction of Topaz's tail.

"Don't do that," Azalea said, hastily; but she was too late, for the terrier, receiving an accidental cut on his hind legs, turned round with his black and tan face, a perfect spark of anger, and bit at the offended legs.

There was an exclamation of pain and rage from the little girls, a sharp cut to a high range of sofas on the part of Rosa and Amelia, and an ineffectual attempt of Azalea's arms to secure Topaz; and then Conrad, covering the terrier, regained his hold of the whip he had dropped in the surprise of pain, and in his blind rage lashed Topaz and Azalea's legs and the chairs and tables indiscriminately.

For an instant the girl stood panting with rage, her face flushed, her eyes sparkling, and then she flung herself on to Conrad, and attacked him in a manner unscientific but effective, i. e., with crooked fingers.

"How dare you!" she gasped, between the scratches; "you nasty cowardly little brute. Ugh!"

By a violent effort Conrad disengaged himself; then he stood up with hands clenched.

"Come on, you girl, glowered. He had been taught to box by a professor of the noble art of making our fellow-creatures flesh and jelly, and he was proud of his skill in what that before science brute strength "was as nothing." Strongly imbued with this idea he felt that the very attitude he assumed would be crushing to his small antagonist. When suddenly, with a mighty rush, Azalea dashed at him, and with her fingers, gloveless, He had been taught to box by a professor of the noble art of making our fellow-creatures flesh and jelly, and he was proud of his skill in what that before science brute strength "was as nothing." Strongly imbued with this idea he felt that the very attitude he assumed would be crushing to his small antagonist. When suddenly, with a mighty rush, Azalea dashed at him, and with her fingers, gloveless, and reducing him to fear his head with a loud yell, and to rush round the room in full flight, crying, "Pax, pax!" He stopped when he found that Azalea, in lieu of pursuing him, was caressing the object of his strife, and was pouring out words of affection to spare his arms once more, and to dance about on his toes in feeble imitation of the professor.

When the excitement, which did not last a minute, it disclosed an appalling sight to the eyes of Miss Slater, who entered with Lord Orme. Amelia, with her frills rivaling the snow, and prickling down his face, stood in attitude of defense, facing Azalea. She, with flushed cheeks and ruffled hair, was eying him vindictively, and the glance she turned on Miss Slater was so menacing that that lady involuntarily recoiled with a vague sense that she had left the drawing-room, and had sent its imps to desecrate her orderly apartment. She turned her appealing face and clasped hands toward Lord Orme, but that gentleman's eyes were riveted on Conrad.

"Good Heavens, Sir!" cried the father, harshly. "Why no you stick out your elbows like that?" and walking up swiftly to Conrad, with a vicious grip he flattened the boy's arms into their right position. "If you're mean enough to hit a girl," he continued, "at least do it in proper style."

"Oh, I say dear children," Miss Slater said, in an agitated tone to the Misses Orme, who were piping little shrill cries of alarm at a safe distance from the combatants, "what has happened to cause this dreadful scene?"

"I think they had better all go to bed," said Lord Orme, despairingly.

Miss Slater folded her arms round her charges impressively.

"My dears," she murmured, as she gave them a parting salute, "let this be a warning to you."

"No need to warn them!" cried the incorrigible Conrad; "they've got no lark in them."

"Won't you shake hands with your—with Rosa and Amelia?" suggested Lord Orme to Azalea.

The latter hunched her shoulders unconvinced.

"I don't like 'em," she said, impressively.

"Azalea!" cried Lord Orme, sharply, "show Miss Slater that you know how to behave as a lady."

The child hung her head with shame and rebellion in her heart; then, with a great gulp, she steadied her voice and looked up.

"I am sorry to have given so much trouble; good-night, Miss Slater."

In spite of the cotton dress and the rustic voice there was a dignity in the child's manner to that she her auditors by surprise. Lord Orme was inwardly pleased. "Race always peops out somewhere," he muttered to himself. He was thinking of his own aristocratic lineage. By the time Azalea reached the door the vulgar element (derived perhaps from the mother's side) was held in check once more; for when Miss Slater suggested benignly that she was glad the little girl was ashamed of herself—" and poor child, how was she to know better?—Azalea was heard to murmur to herself, "I ain't a bit ashamed, and I hate 'em all."

CHAPTER III.

THE FIRST MORNING AT BRIGHTON.

The next morning Azalea awoke as the day was dawning—awoke with a strange wonder at missing the familiar sounds and sights of entering birds outside her window. She rubbed her eyes, and then thrust her little white feet out of bed and stared out of the opposite window. She sat and watched until all the gray shadows in the air melted away before the new-risen rm. There was a sea; yes, there was a sea: waves were rushing and tumbling over each other in mighty volumes of hissing foam. Just where the wan light in the east touched over the burning anger beneath it, Azalea could discern a troubled sail dipping and rising with the alternate speed and sullenness of the waters.

She sat and looked until she was filled with restless longing. She must go down to get nearer to the bubby ridges of water. She thirsted to breathe that stormy wind, to plant her feet on the shining heaps of shivering foam. She rose in the early beam and fluttered hat found their way down stairs, and Azalea, mounted on a high chair, was making desperate attempts to slide the heavy bolts of the front-door. A good-natured char-woman, hired to obviate the necessity of disturbing the servants rising too early, came to her assistance.

"You want to get out, dear," she said, kindly, and then she looked after Azalea, astonished at the novel importation into Orme House. The latter ran swiftly down the road until she came to the esplanade wall. Underneath it the sea there were winding paths that led down to the beach, and creeping under the shelter of the wall to the groove-way, she could see one of these, and ran down the slopes as only a child can run with all her heart in her legs.

How glorious it was! The sun was brighter now on the water; all along the coast the sea seemed alive in its light; the heavy shoes dashed recklessly through the wet shingle, and Azalea pounced on to every clump of shining weed she saw, and trailed them up to her nose with the expression of mingled ecstasy and disorder. The cross, white faces of Rosa and Amelia; the prim outline of Miss Slater—all faded away before the immensity of the new experience. She could not define them; she only knew that she was inhaling with her breath, devouring with her eyes, and tasting with every instinct of her living frame a wondrous exultation. She clapped her hands in the foam that broke in her glowing faces; she shouted out with delight, and did not heed how lonely her voice sounded, opposed to that heaving mass of water, or how small and glory of the early morning, as yet unbroken by any other human disturbance. At last, breathless, and with arms filled with treasures of sea-weed and sea-worn pebbles, she sat down to rest under the shelter of a boat that stood on a high mound of shingle.

Unfortunately, when she had begun again to paddle in the humid shingle, she had kicked her shoes off that she might the more unreservedly plunge her feet into the rippling eddies of foam that kept circling up near her; now when she drew on her flannel socks, she searched in vain for one of the shoes.

Not wishing to wet her socks, she hopped up and down for some few minutes—a somewhat engaging spectacle—and peered into the shingle —and then she stopped short; for, bobbing on the crest of an advancing wave, she saw a black object unquestionably like that she sought. She made a desperate plunge, and very nearly succeeded in catching hold of the leathern boot, which floated tantalizingly approximately for her hand, and then out it was borne by the waves receded.

Azalea stood breathless and despairing: "How am I ever to catch it?" she cried, piteously.

"Hallo! have you come to grief?" said some one behind her, in a cheerful voice.

Azalea turned round, and recognized her antagonist of the night before.

"They're in a dreadful state about you—at least ps is; they think you're lost, you know—ran away, or something. Miss Slater's been every where for you; and Miss Slater said it was providential, and told Rosa and Amelia to pray for you when they said grace over their breakfast. I guess she'll pray to a different tune when she finds you're all right," the ingenuous youth added, with a grin.

"How can I go home like this?" urged Amalee, pointing downward to her shoeless foot. "Oh, do help me to catch it!" she cried, as once more the waves brought the black speck nearer to her.

"Catch hold!" he cried, flinging off his velvet jacket on to Azalea's arm; and in another instant he was wading valorously into the waters.

Unhappily, the length of his legs was not proportionate to the greatness of his courage, and the latter seemed nearly to evaporate when he suddenly found that he had lost his footing.

"I'm carried off my legs!" he began to shout; but a hand was placed him in mouth to stop it, his head, and the latter dragged him on terra firma.

"Pray don't try any more," she said, hastily; "I had much rather lose the shoe than see you do that again. Thank you, all the same," she added, gratefully.

"Oh! it was nothing at all: I can do much more plucky things than that," the young hero said, magnificently waving modesty, as he did not offer to repeat his experiment, and Azalea turned away from the sea, casting one wistful look after her lost property.

"I'm going another way," Conrad said, suddenly, when they reached the cliff. He had not minded the risk of losing drowned, but it was impossible that he could walk up to the house in company with this shabby little girl.

As she entered the house she saw Lord Orme standing on his threshold, looking anxiously in a different direction from that whence she came. "Mr. Conrad is only gone on before. He saw me!" Azalea murmured, nervously. She was not struck by the fact that Lord Orme was the only man of those in the house who cared to watch for the truant. It is sad how little we prize anxiety which is likely to entail reproaches on us from the loving.

When Lord Orme did turn his eyes on Azalea he hurried back to the house, hugely ashamed whether to rejoice or scold. Relieved of his anxiety, his first impulse was to curse the cause of it; but his attention was diverted away to a smothered laugh, as he noted the supreme absurdity of her appearance.

Hopping along the cold pavement like a dejected bird in winter time, that carries his leg in his feathers for warmth's sake; her face downcast, her ruffled hair the wind's prey; and not a hat fluttering like a dismal pennon behind her; her hands rosy with cold, stiffly clenched on long trails of shining sea-weed; a few pebbles hugged up in her lap, Topaz glaring under her arm, two little toes peeping out from the exposed gray stocking!—positively that picture presented to Lord Orme and the two spotlessly-attired little girls who, with their governess, looked from the window on whom Miss Slater termed "the disgrace to Lord Orme's door-steps."

CHAPTER IV.

A GLIMPSE OF LADY DIANA.

LORD ORME, for he followed Azalea through the doorway, looked round involuntarily to see whether any one was observing the child's unseemly appearance.

For an instant he saw nothing but the long row of lemons, gleaming white in the morning sun, the empty parade, and the flutter of the sail which Adam had previously unfurled, followed in his wake, he was about to re-enter his house, when a slight gust of wind wafted past him an almond scent of flowers.

"Heliotrope," said Lord Orme, inhaling its fragrance with satisfaction; "how sweet it is! that must come from the balcony next door."

He looked at the balcony in question, and there his glance fell on something even more lovely than the sweet bud that had been taught to writhe round and clamber over, in wanton profusion, the harsh lines of iron bars; something sweeter to a man's eyes, than the summer-like breaths that came from the boxes of mignonnette, and the purple bloom of the heliotrope. There, with her face averted, her gaze turned seaward, her arms crossed on the balustrade, her whole attitude indicative of voluptuous repose, stood a lady, who appeared quite unconscious of observation.

Apparently she had stepped out from her dressing-room to breathe for an instant the fresh morning air, and found her eyes on the waves, tumbling in sun and shadow against the coast. The wind lifted the warm-colored auburn hair, which floated over her shoulders, and fluttered the lace sleeves that hung loosely about her round white arms. The face was veiled, but only the edge of one pink cheek was visible; but the plenteous hair, the bared arms, and the delicately outlined figure, round which the velvet robe fell with such exquisite harmony—all indicated that the name of the face, whose that fairest of God's works, a beautiful woman. The face that was averted from Lord Orme was as charming as those lineaments left by her little ear, bright cheek, and brighter hair indicated. Rims-gray eyes, heavy lidded; a delicate nose; a rose-bud mouth; lips curved for classical perfection, but not for man's worship; a dimpled chin, and round throat. For her faults; the eyes were too close together; the face, when closely examined, showed certain weary lines; the eyes wore an anxious expression: but it not been for the infantine dimpled chin, you would have said that the first bloom of youth no longer rested on this charming countenance; but when the face became animated—when the eyes glistened, and the lips smiled—then men were ready to swear that Lady Diana Merton numbered, not thirty-five, but twenty summers.

She moved presently as if to re-enter her chamber, and as she turned she lifted her arms slightly and yawned, as though the languor of sleep still hung over her: the movement flung back the lace sleeves yet further, and sent a great float of warm hair down to her waist. The purple robe, the red flowers that clustered near its hem, the bright face, the grace of her movement, all combined to form a lovely picture, a charming bit of color for a painter's eye, a lovely sight to any man.

Lord Orme glanced once toward the balcony, and then his gaze lowered, and he looked steadfastly at another object which was coming rapidly down the cliffs.

"By G—! I think she goes a little short on that near leg. Nicholls' (this was to his groom), "take that horse, please. I shall be out to look at her directly." Then dropping his voice mysteriously—for he was as tender of his horse's reputation as he was of his daughter's—he added, "I'm afraid there's something wrong with that leg."

Lady Diana trailed her rich robes back through her window without perceiving her successful rival, the mare, and went to her breakfast with a diseased mind disposed to her dimples.

Lord Orme shook his head sadly as he turned to re-enter his house. "I gave a hundred and fifty for her," he murmured.

It was afternoon; the sun was hot on the sea, and the morning work of the morning had entirely subsided; the air was now too languid to ripple the edges of the waves; all the moving shadows in the sea, houses, and rocks, sparkles which had danced innumerable in the wind's strong face, had died away in the hot, indolent calm of noon.

It was three o'clock; the Misses Orme had finished their lessons, and were preparing for their afternoon promenade on the cliff.

Lord Orme had directed the housekeeper to provide some clothes for Azalea when the young lass went with town fashion than the print frock and flannel socks.

"What difference dress do make, to be sure!" Mrs. Benson said, admiringly, when her task was ended, and Azalea ragged and Azalea comfortable was transformed into neat and uncomfortable Azalea.

She led the child to a mirror and bid her look at herself. The reflection represented a young lady habited in a neat blue cloth suit; her short, boy-like curls were disposed in smooth, glossy order under a beaver hat. The coarse pair of ankles were done justice to by fine silk stockings and close-fitting kid boots.

"Now, miss, you are to go out and walk with the governess and the young ladies: and oh! here is a muff. What is that for? Why to put your hands in, to be sure—rather too much to-day. I'm sure you look as nice as a new sixpence, (aside) much nicer than those pasty-faced wenches down stairs."

Azalea looked pleased. "Yes, I look quite as nice as they do," she thought. She thanked Mrs. Benson, and left the stairs with a very dignified trip, which had something of Rosa Orme's manner in it.

She felt strong in the possession of stiff skirts. Inwardly she said to Rosa and Amelia, "I can look out as well as you."

Miss Slater and the young ladies received her with grim silence when she reached the sitting-room. Only once did the former lift up her voice as the party quitted the house.

"Not that dog, I beg, Miss Moore."

Topaz was puttering about the room after them with a speed which threatened to break his thin, spidery legs.

"I will go out by myself, if you like," Azalea said, politely; "but, of course, Topaz wants his walk."

She walked on, Topaz trotting contentedly by her side. Her companions had no option but to follow her, for Lord Orme had cautioned the governess not to leave the child alone when outside the house.

The four walked on in silence for a time, making part of a procession of human creatures that shifted to and fro by the side of the gray sea-line. Miss Slater and her charges were endeavoring to detect individuals in the faces and the vanities of the crowd. Azalea had no one at whom to make stiff bows or little false smiles, so she turned her eyes outward.

Nowhere are nature and art brought face to face in such marked contrast as at Brighton. On the cliff above is the town, with its fashion and low imperishable mutability. The old sea can his scorn up to the streets of pygmies that make a narrow line of color between earth and sky, crying, "Oh, miserable pigmies! cease to scan the traces of passion, and your unmeaning laughter and hopeless tears will no longer echo over my vast loneliness."

Some dim sense of the contrast between the gay flutter of the crowd and the sullen grandeur of the steel-gray waters below reached Azalea.

"Do you ever feel afraid of the sea?" she asked Rosa Orme.

"I'm afraid when I'm on it—I'm so afraid of being sea-sick," was that young lady's prosaic answer.

"You have been on it!" Azalea said, in an awe-stricken tone. "What did it feel like?"

"First your head goes round and round, then it seems to swim up to the top of a wave and down again to your shoes, and then—oh, it's dreadful!"

"I think I should love it," Azalea said, dreamily.

"Wait till you're on it," was the significant rejoinder. The conversation was interrupted by Miss Slater.

"Rosa, dear; hands up—toes down."

Rosa obeyed, and tripped on with increased haughtiness of aspect, while Azalea dropped her head in involuntary rebellion to that harsh, untender voice.

Meanwhile various little annoyances incidental to her assumption of new attire began to trouble Azalea.

Her shoes, new and stiff, already girded her over the instep. Her feet, numbed and compressed, seemed to be dissolved in one aching toe. She thought remorsefully of that clear old comfortable shoe resting under her dressing-table, and of its companion, now probably full of seawater, softer and more comfortable than ever. She hated her gloves too; they seemed to tie up all the fingers of her fingers; and most of all did she loathe a certain ruche of lace which formed the collar of her dress, and which was drawn together by two strings, one of which dangled down her back, and irritated the wearer to a sort of fidgety frenzy.

"Oh!" she exclaimed, at last, turning, and desperately facing Miss Slater, "I can't bear it any longer; I shall go mad presently."

Miss Slater, who had from her little enemy with angry and distrustful eyes, sought to hear her into silence; but Medusa would have had no effect under the circumstances, unless she had first flung one of her snakes down Azalea's back, and commanded it to swallow the offending string.

"Oh!" she cried, tearfully, "do put your hand down my back and pull it away."

The little girls giggled. Miss Slater gave the child a rough shake. Azalea stumbled in the impetus given to her steps, and at the same moment dropped her muff. Ere she had time to recover it Topaz's quick eye noted the fallen prize. It was a glorious plaything for a light-hearted, active dog. He scampered up the streets, then back and down the pavement, then across the cliff, and every time he dropped it he growled a menacing defiance to all comers; until he had managed to fix again the fur securely between his sharp white teeth.

"Oh, dear!" cried Azalea, dismally; "how can I get him to stop?"

Then she suddenly, to the horror of her companions, gave utterance to a succession of shrill sounds.

"Your papa never could have foreseen all this," Miss Slater began, with not unnatural indignation. "To be seen in company with a girl who stands still in the middle of Brighton, whistling like a ploughboy—I rather too much to endure. I have no control over that vulgar little creature; but I must beg you, Rosa and Amelia, to walk on."

Azalea did not see that her party had deserted her; her eyes were fixed on the movements of the favorite. The dog, suddenly alive to the fact on the other side of the cliff, and incautiously chose to sit down and regard his prize in the face of an advancing pony-chaise, drawn by two ponies little fretting bay ponies, and his mistress perceived that, with the mental activity very quality, he would infallibly be run over in another moment.

The lady who was driving the pony-chaise (we have seen her charming face before) was turning her little reins and dreamy gray eyes toward the sea, when her ponies' hoofs clattered in dangerous proximity to Topaz's head. Then she looked languidly toward the cliff, and was curving her whip-lash through the air with the intention of stimulating the ponies' speed, when a white, desperate little face rose up suddenly in front of them. A child's hand clutched hold of the reins, and then the ponies reared up. There was a sound of a yelp. The child's face disappeared, the lady bowed forward, and Lady Di Merton understood from the exclamations of the crowd round her that she had driven over a child.

MARRIAGE DAYS.

MARRIAGE is the only ceremony that in some form or other is universal all over the habitable globe; the most highly civilized and the most savage tribe alike appearing to recognize the necessity for the union of one man and one woman, that the purpose of their creation may be carried out.

In "The Marriage Day in all Ages and Countries," just published by Harper & Brothers, New York, the author has entered in a very full and interesting manner into the subject of marriages as celebrated all over the world, and from his book we make a few selections for our readers.

Among the Romans the nations great importance is attached to the day of the week on which a marriage takes place. In former times the Jews found many days for the respective ceremonies of betrothal and marriage; thus, the fourth day was appointed for virgins, and the fifth for widows. Similarly, the more modern Hebrews fixed Wednesday and Friday for the former, and Thursday for the latter. At the present moment Wednesday is generally the day on which the Jew sponsors and bachelors celebrate their marriages, and the following day is a ball concludes the affair; but if either of the parties has been previously married the Sabbath is the day chosen, and music and dancing form no part of the entertainment. The original reason for selecting Wednesday was because the Sanhedrin held its sitting on Thursday, and therefore the newly married man could immediately after his wedding bring his wife before the meeting, if he found any reason to accuse her.

The belief is very general that Friday is an unlucky day for marriage. In Barbary no marriage is permitted on that day or on Tuesday and Wednesday.

In Norway and Sweden Sunday is the favorite for bridals, while Thursday, the day of Thor, is looked upon as a Pagan day on which no Christian ceremony ought to be performed.

In Scotland the upper classes affect Monday for their weddings, while the lower classes generally select Tuesday, perhaps because in 1711 it was enacted, for the better observance of the Sabbath, no wedding should take place on Monday.

Another peculiarity of the Scottish people is, that they much favor the last day of the year for celebrating marriages. There are more weddings on that day in Scotland than in any week of the year, except, of course, the week in which that day occurs. When the new year and the last day of the year are coincident the time is considered very propitious. In Wales Saturday would appear to be the great marrying day. In England there are yet extant many superstitions about the wedding-day. "Marry in Lent, and you'll live to repent," is a strong still current. Innocent's day, 28th December, is considered particularly unlucky. A popular rhyme in English country places gives the folk-lore relating to the days of the week on which weddings ought and ought not to take place:

"Monday for wealth,
Tuesday for health,
Wednesday the best day of all;
Thursday for crosses,
Friday for losses,
Saturday no luck at all."

In Roman Catholic countries the Church forbids marriage from the first Sunday in Advent until after the fifteenth day of the Feast of Circumcision, and from the beginning of Lent until Low-Sunday.

The stage of the moon has more influence with semi-barbarous peoples than the day of the week in fixing the date upon which marriages. The ancient Greeks married either at the full or at the new moon; the Romans paid less attention to the former, and more to the particular month, although they considered the Calends, Nones, and Ides of every month unsuitable for marriage, and universally disliked the whole month of February and the blooming month of May. In many parts of England and Scotland a superstitious feeling against May marriages still lingers.

So important was marriage considered among the Spartans that celibacy was one of deemed infamous; and, by the laws of Lycurgus, criminal proceedings might be taken against those who married late or unsuitably, as well as against those who did not marry at all. An old bachelor was stigmatized, and obliged to walk naked in the Gymnopædiæ through the market-place, singing a satirical song on himself.

In 1636 the local authorities of Eastham, in Massachusetts, decreed that every unmarried man in the township should kill six blackbirds or three crows yearly while he remained single, and that, as a penalty for not obeying the order, he should not get married until he had destroyed the requisite number in arrears. In 1756 the Assembly of Maryland laid a tax of five shillings a year upon all bachelors above thirty-five years of age who were possessed of one hundred pounds; and of twenty shillings a year upon all bachelors and widowers, without children, who were above that age and possessed of three hundred pounds.

In very few countries does affection appear to enter into the question of the marriage. To purchase would appear to be the more common method of acquiring a wife over the greater part of the world. In Siam, the price of a wife would not appear to be heavy. In Syria the father receives for his daughter five special articles, namely, a mare, a camel, a gun, a yataghan, bracelets, and a camel-bag, whatever the latter may be. These articles, however, are made over to the bride herself.

The Babylonians, like the Assyrians, held a kind of market of their females at certain times every year. They were assembled in a public place, where they were exposed to general view, and disposed of to the highest bidder by the public crier. The money given for the purchase of the handsome ones was applied to portion off those who were deficient in personal attractions.

The quasi-Christians of Georgia and Circassia entered frequently into their matrimonial negotiations, and treat them as mere matters of purchase and sale, according to the value of the woman.

In China, among the respectable classes, the husband gives the wife a dowry, and in fact, from the moment of it, and from the number of valuable presents which he makes her, he may be said to purchase her.

In Java, as in common marriages, a price is always paid by the husband for his wife.

Upon the west coast of Africa, when a girl is of a marriageable age she is conducted about the village by her friends, in order to advertise the fact; and her hands and arms are adorned with gold trinkets, as lures to the young men. In South Africa a woman is invariably sold into matrimony, sometimes as many as twenty dollars are given for her. In case of separation the husband receives back from his wife's relations the price that he paid for her.

Dr. Clarke, in his "Travels," says: "The ceremony of marriage among the Kalmucks is performed on horseback. A girl is first mounted, who rides off at full speed. Her lover pursues; if he overtakes her she becomes his wife, and returns with him to his tent. But it sometimes happens that the woman does not wish to marry the person by whom she is pursued; in this case she will not suffer him to overtake her. We were assured that no instance occurs of a

GOOD ADVICE.

Kalmuck girl being thus caught, unless she have a partiality to the purser. If she dislikes him she rides, to use the language of English sportsmen, 'neck or nought,' until she has completely effected her escape, or until her purser's horse becomes exhausted, leaving her at liberty to return, and to be afterward chased by some more favored admirer.' This ride is not undertaken until after the price for the girl has been agreed upon between the would-be bridegroom and her friends, he thus having to pay for as well as to capture her.

In Lapland, if one asks the father of a marriageable girl to take a drink, and the offer is accepted, it is understood that the person standing treat is accepted as a son-in-law. Such a custom introduced here would be a heavier blow to bar-rooms than any excise law ever framed.

There was anciently a fallacious notion prevalent among the ignorant in England that a man, by setting up his wife to public auction, and parting with her for a price, dissolved the nuptial bond, and escaped from all its obligations. Frequent instances of the sales of wives in open markets have occurred, and one happened so late as 1859.

Perhaps the following may be novel to many of our readers: "If a gentleman wishes to make known his desire to be married, he wears a ring on the first finger of the left hand; if engaged, on the second; if married, on the third; and on the little finger if he is a determined old bachelor. The same rule applies to the ladies. A ring worn on the first finger is a silent advertisement for a husband; on the second, a token of engagement; the third, matrimony; and the little finger, the gentle intimation of the wish to die an old maid." According to the author of a book called "Love's Telegraph," the above is a modern American fashion.

"THE UNWELCOME VISITOR."

THIS picture is from a painting by MR. ASSELT, an English artist, who is well known as a skilful animal painter. This subject, however, is somewhat out of his beaten track. Here, besides the examples of the way in which the artist has "many a time and oft" represented sheep —rams and wethers, ewes and lambs—in all situations, including that of the parents defending their young, we have a specimen of the painter's ability in depicting Monsieur Reynard, under circumstances advantageous for the display of his vulpine, slinking, cunning, and cowardly cruelty. The situation represented may appear to some readers as rather forced and questionable: but we can assure them that in parts of Scotland the foxes are very large and powerful, and correspondingly audacious, and that often they are very destructive to sheep. And with this assurance we may safely leave the picture to tell its own tale to those who may see it merely through the medium of our engraving.

THE LOG JAM ON THE CHIPPEWA.

We illustrate on page 360 a characteristic incident of the late freshets in Wisconsin. The piers shown in the picture were put in by FOUND, HALBERT, & CO. to protect their works below from damage by the heavy ice freshets in the spring, and also to detain temporarily the logs, to prevent them from running into the river until they could sort out their own logs from the general drive. Some of these piers stand in forty feet water, which is quite deep for a long distance above the piers. There was a much larger amount of logs put in during the last winter than ever before, and probably about sixty million feet were put in on the ice, so that when the latter went out this large body of logs moved together and choked up the river. Immediately behind this came the general drive of probably ninety millions more. The jam formed something more than half a mile above the piers, and extended up the river more than a mile and a half—one solid mass of logs, and there they stuck, refusing to move.

A large number of men were set to work to break it up, which they finally succeeded in doing, when the entire mass moved together for half a mile, presenting one of the grandest scenes ever witnessed, although attended with some danger to those who remained on the mass while it was in motion.

The piers proved strong enough to stop the logs, else every thing below in the shape of piers, booms, and logs would have been swept away. The logs are in many places piled twenty feet above the level of the water.

FLIGHT OF BIRDS.

BIRDS, as regards structure, are perhaps the most perfectly endowed, as they are certainly the most beautiful and interesting, of all the lower animals. In birds there is an admirable mechanism and adaptation both for gliding in the air and swimming in the water. They surpass all other animals in the faculty of continuing their motion without resting, as well as in its rapidity. The fleetest courser can scarcely ever run more than a mile in a minute, nor support that speed beyond five or six such exertions. But the joyous swallow does this tenfold for pleasure. In his usual way he flies at the rate of one mile in a minute; and WILSON, the ornithologist, ascertained that the swallow is so engaged for ten hours every day. So can the bluebird of America, for a space of 600 miles. Carrier-pigeons move with half that celerity; one flew from Liskeard to London, 220 miles, in six hours. The golden eagle is supposed to dart through the fiercest storm at the rate of 160 miles an hour; but one of our smallest birds, the swift, can even quadruple the most excited quickness of the race-horse for a distance. SPALLANZANI thought that the little swift traveled at the rate of 250 miles an hour.

Inquiries into the phenomena of the flight of birds would lead us far beyond our limits. The subject is beset with error. Thus, we read: "Every one has remarked the manner in which birds of prey float, as it were, without any effort, and with steady expanded wings, at great heights in the atmosphere. This they are enabled to do from the quantity of air contained in the air-cells of their bodies, which air being taken in at a low level in the atmosphere, of course rarefies and expands as the bird ascends into higher regions. Their rapidity of descent must be accomplished by the sudden expulsion of this air, aided by their muscular efforts."

Now DR. CRISP has read to the Zoological Society a paper "On the presence or absence of air in the bones of birds," for the purpose of showing the prevailing error upon the subject—viz., "that the bones of the bird are filled with air." Of fifty-two British birds recently dissected by him, only one, the sparrow-hawk, had the bones generally perforated for the admission of air. In thirteen others, the humeri only were hollow, and among these were several birds of short flight. In the remaining thirty-eight, neither the humeri nor femora contained air, although in this list were several birds of passage and of rapid flight—DR. CRISP's conclusion being, that the majority of British birds have no air in their bones, and that, with the exception of the falcons, but very few British birds have hollow femora.

MR. GOULD records a most remarkable instance of rapid and sustained flight, which he witnessed on his return from North America, whither he had proceeded for the purpose of studying the habits and manners of the species of trochilus (humming-bird) frequenting that portion of

THE UNWELCOME VISITOR.—[FROM A PAINTING BY R. ASSELT.]

America. Having remarked that he arrived just prior to the period of the migration of this bird from Mexico to the north, and had ample opportunities for observing it in a state of nature, he noticed that its actions were very peculiar, and quite different from those of all other birds: the flight is performed by a motion of the wings so rapid as to be almost imperceptible; indeed, the muscular power of this little creature appears to be very great in every respect, as, independently of its rapid and sustained flight, it grasps the twig, twigs, flowers, &c., to which it alights with the utmost tenacity. It appears to be most active in the morning and evening, and to pass the middle of the day in a state of sleepy torpor. Occasionally it occurs in such numbers that fifty or sixty birds may be seen in a single tree. When captured it so speedily becomes tame that it will feed from the hand or mouth within half an hour.

THE TRUE SYSTEM OF TRADING.—CHICKERING & SONS.

PIANOS, as an article of luxury, have always been held at fancy prices—marked up to figures which none of the makers ever expected to realize, except in a few cases, where the free-handed, careless rich man gives a check without questioning the price. Such instances are remarkably rare, for the great mass of purchasers search out, with inveterate persistency, that store where they can get a good piano at the lowest possible price.

But how is the lowest price obtained? By bartering for half an hour, and then out to some other store to compare notes; returning for another bartering palaver, and securing a further reduction in price; another trip to piano-stores where the discount offered at last store is mentioned, whereupon each maker goes a little better, until the lowest point—say 15 or 20 per cent.—is obtained, and the customer returns to the first place, gets the piano at the lowest price offered by all competitors, with perhaps a stool and cover thrown in, to clinch the bargain. This is the style of trade upon the fancy-price system. It is a system of diamond cut diamond; one in which the most persistent or the most unscrupulous will win; one where the buyer believes that the seller is going to cheat him, if he can, and so is ever on the defensive. A system, in short, which blunts the fine sense of honor and self-respect both in the buyer and the seller, and destroys all confidence between them.

The fancy system has always existed to a certain extent, but now that pianos are no longer luxuries, but necessities, a new and less wealthy class is brought upon the scene, and the "knocking-down" system has increased in vigor and magnitude, from the fact that, while formerly with the rich it was a matter of principle, with the less rich now it is a matter of necessity.

CHICKERING & SONS, who have for nearly fifty years ranked as the leading manufacturers of the country, and whose position has naturally brought them into connection with the finest classes of society, conscious of the great power and demoralizing influence of the system, determined to abandon it, and to adopt in its place the one-price system—a price that should be invariable, that should give assurance to the public that a Chickering Piano can be purchased at prices uniform with those of Boston and New York in Portland, Chicago, St. Louis, Charleston, New Orleans, or any other place where a Chickering agent exists, the difference being only that of boxing and transportation.

The system has been tested upon a close calculation of the cost of manufacture, with a fair manufacturer's profit added to it. By abolishing all discounts, and while making exactly the same superior piano, Chickering & Sons have concluded that they can sell to the public to-day for $475 the same instrument which the discount system compelled them to charge $600 for last year, and the same scale of reduction in all classes of their instruments, up to the Concert Grand Piano.

These pianos are no cheaper to the makers than before, nor are they no cheaper to purchasers who persist until they have beaten every thing down to the very lowest point; but they are to the fair customer, who, believing that reputable houses are honest, used to pay what they were asked, but can now gain the same amount with the discount-bargainers, without the trouble of asking for it. There is no variation in the prices named; but just so much money as is marked in the price-list can buy just such a piano as is named opposite to it.

This is as it should be; it is a movement which affects favorably all classes throughout the country; and there can not be a doubt but that Chickering & Sons will be fully and heartily indorsed wherever the knowledge of their one-priced sterling pianos extends, and it will travel fast enough and far enough, depend upon it.

FOSTER'S MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

Its Physical Geography, including Sketches of the Topography, Botany, Climates, Geology, and Mineral Resources; and of the Progress of Development in Population and Material Wealth. By J. W. Foster, LL.D., President of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, Joint-Author of "Foster and Whitney's Report on the Geology of the Lake Superior Region," Lecturer on Physical Geography and Cognate Sciences in the University of Chicago, &c. Illustrated by Maps and Sections. Chicago: S. C. Griggs & Co. London: Trubner & Co. 1869.

450 Pages, 8vo. Price $3 50.

SENT, PREPAID, ON RECEIPT OF THE PRICE.

Dr. Foster's book is an honor to the country, and particularly an honor to Chicago, where it was written, printed, and published. It is scientific, but its science is clothed in language plain and interesting. —Journal, Charlestown.

It is the most creditable volume Chicago has ever produced. There is nothing ephemeral or local in its value. It is instructive in the treatment of its subject alike interesting to the student of abstract science and the statesman, the saker and the business man of enlarged views.—Chicago Journal.

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

If you would have a brief yet comprehensive description of each of the Pacific Railroad routes, get FOSTER'S MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

MINERAL RESOURCES.

If you wish to know about the Gold, Silver, Iron, Copper, Lead, and Coal Mines of the vast region between the Great Lakes and the Pacific Shore, read FOSTER'S MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

ACTION OF EARTHQUAKES.

If you would have a fine description of the Mississippi River—its area, basins, characteristic vegetation, overflows, bluff formations, geology, and the peculiarities of its channel—earthquakes in detail—the physical aspects of the valley, read Dr. FOSTER'S MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

EFFECT OF FORESTS ON HEALTH.

If you desire to know the effects of forests upon health—how they retain moisture, absorb noxious gases, check drouths, and modify climate—examine FOSTER'S MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

ORIGIN OF THE PRAIRIES.

If you would know the origin of the prairies, or the geological structure of the region around the Great Lakes, the Mississippi Valley, the Rocky Mountain and Pacific Coast ranges, or the wonders of the "drift epoch," get FOSTER'S work, THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

ICEBERGS and MOUND BUILDERS.

Would you go back amid dead ages, among the MOUNDS and the MOUND BUILDERS; see the blazing fires of VOLCANOES now extinct; hear the thundering tread of the AVALANCHE along the granite sides of mountains rising heavenward 14,000 feet; or listen to the "Fourth music" of the great army of ICEBERGS grinding and polishing huge ROCKS, transporting and dropping them along the plains as EVERLASTING MEMORIALS of their accurately and correctly march from a frozen realm to a sunny clime? read that interesting volume, FOSTER'S MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

ATMOSPHERIC CURRENTS.

If you wish to know the origin of atmospheric currents, or about the prevailing winds, rain charts, isothermal lines, and how energy in man varies within these different lines; the evaporative power of winds, the degrees of heat and cold, of moisture and dryness of that boundless region west of the Great Lakes toward which all the nations of the earth are now tending, and which is shortly to be the CENTRE of the WORLD'S WEALTH AND POWER, buy and read Foster's Great Work, THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

THE BEST BOOK FOR SCHOOLS.

For schools and colleges it is more valuable as a text-book, or reading-book, than half of the books now in use. It is practical, reliable, and gives just such information as every man, woman, and child is interested in knowing.

SURPASSES ALL OTHER WORKS OF THE KIND,

No other work gives so good an idea of the vast resources and the peculiarities and grandeur of the West, as the 450 pages of this beautiful book, which

The Celebrated Imitation Gold
$15. HUNTING WATCHES. $20.
THE COLLINS OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Our superior Oroide Watches having recently been invented, and worthless Watches sold in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities, represented as our Watches, we would caution the public against them, and give notice that we are in no way responsible for these bogus concerns, and only those purchasing direct from us can secure a genuine Watch of our manufacture. We have recently greatly improved our Oroide in appearance and durability; and, to protect the public from imposition hereafter, we have issued the

CASES OF THE COLLINS METAL (IMPROVED OROIDE).

335 Broadway.

and we give notice that any one making use of this name will be prosecuted to the extent of the law.

The metal has all the brilliancy and durability of Gold; can not be distinguished from it by the best judges; retains its color and warm coat, and is equal to gold excepting its intrinsic value. As our Gentlemen's Watches are Full-Jeweled Patent Levers; those for Ladies an improved Escapement, better than a Lever for a small Watch; all in Hunting Cases, and fully guaranteed by special certificate. The Movements are equal in neatness, style of finish, general appearance, and for time, to a Gold one costing $150. Those for $20 are of extra fine finish, and are fully equal to a Gold Watch costing $200. Chains of every style, from $2 to $6.

JEWELRY.—We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Collins Metal—Pins, Earrings, Sleeve-Buttons, Lockets, Studs, Pencils, Sleeve-Holders, Pencils, Charms, Odd Fellow and Masonic Fins, &c., all of the latest and most elegant styles, and fully equal to gold in appearance and wear.

TO CLUBS.—Where five Watches are ordered at one time, we will send one extra Watch free of charge.

We positively employ no agents (who would require a commission), as we can not possibly manufacture the above for less than the published prices. Our regular customers, therefore, have the benefit of our lowest prices. Parties in New York or elsewhere representing themselves as our agents are swindles. The genuine Collins Watches can only be had at our office in New York City. Customers are requested not to send money in letters, as we will send goods to any part of the United States to be paid for when taken from the express office. Express charges pay all express charges. In ordering, be plainly the name, town, county, and state. Customers in the city will remember that our only Office is Science Advances.

As soon as an article purporting to be of utility has been tested, and its merits endorsed by public opinion, unprincipled parties endeavor to replenish their depleted purses by counterfeiting, and substituting a spurious for the genuine article. Some time since, mercury, in the disguise of pills, powders, &c., was given for all diseases of the stomach and liver, while quinine was freely administered for the chills. At length made its advent, and an entire new system of healing was inaugurated. The medicinal effects of this valuable preparation were at once acknowledged, and mineral poisons suffered to sink into that obscurity to which an enlightened age has consigned them. There have been many spurious Bitters palmed upon the community, which, after trial, have been found perfectly worthless; while HOSTETTER'S has proved a blessing to thousands, who owe to it their restoration to health and strength.

For many years we have watched the steady progress of

in public estimation, and its beneficent effects as a cure for all complaints arising from the stomach of a morbid nature, and we are free to say that it can be relied on as a sure relief and remedy. Its proprietors have made the above preparation, after years of careful study and skilling, and are now reaping the reward illustrated by this valuable specific, and which they so richly merit. It is the only preparation of the kind that is reliable in all cases, and it therefore demands the attention of the afflicted.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment are guaranteed to cure the worst cases of bronchial disease. This is no idle statement. Sufferers, take heed ere it is too late. Try your bronchial affection may soon be a consumption.

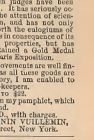
IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.



The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its qualities and resemblance to Gold are such that even judges have been deceived. It has attracted and excited the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogisms of the press in consequence of peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition.

The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured on my own Premises I am enabled to warrant them as excellent time-keepers.

Price now $15 to $20.

A SEAMAN'S GRAVE.

INDEPENDENTLY of any personal interest, sailors are always very desirous that no one should die aboard their vessel; or rather, they have a great objection to the body of any who has died remaining among them. This is a superstition easily accounted for with men whose entire lives are passed, as it were, on the very edge of the grave, and who have quite enough, as they suppose, to remind them of their mortality without the actual presence of the effects.

An idea prevails among them that sharks will follow a ship which has a corpse on board for a whole voyage; and the loss of a mast, the long duration of a foul wind, or any other inconvenience, is sure to be ascribed to the same influence. Accordingly when a man dies on board ship there is an obvious anxiety among the crew to get rid of their late shipmate as soon as possible.

It need not be mentioned that the surgeon is in constant attendance upon the dying man, who has generally been removed from his hammock to a cot, which is larger and more commodious, and is placed within a screen on one side of the sick-bay, as the hospital of the ship is called. It is usual for the captain to pass through this place and to speak to the men every morning; and I imagine there is hardly a ship in the service in which wines, fresh meat, and any other supplies recommended by the surgeon are not sent from the tables of the captain and officers to such of the men who require a more generous diet than the ship's stores provide. The restoration of the health of the invalids by such supplies is perhaps not more important than the moral influence of the attention on the part of the officers.

Every captain ought to be seen, no matter for how short a time, by the bedside of any of his crew whom the surgeon may report as dying. Not occasionally, but uniformly, in the quiet sobriety of real kindness, as well as hearty consideration for the feelings of a man falling at his post in the service of his country. The éclat of such a death is inferior, no doubt, to that which occurs in battle; but we should recollect that on this very account the sacrifice deserves more attention at our hands. The merit is not less when the soldier or sailor dies in a distant land, his story untold, his sufferings unseen.

As soon as the surgeon's ineffectual offices are at an end he walks to the quarter-deck and reports to the officer of the watch that one of his patients has just expired. At whatever hour of the day or night this occurs, the captain is immediately acquainted with the circumstance. At the same time the master-at-arms is ordered to take charge of the dead man's clothes. Very shortly after poor Jack dies he is prepared for his deep-sea grave by his messmates, who, with the assistance of the sail-maker, in the presence of the master-at-arms, sew him up in his hammock, and having placed a couple of shot at his feet, they rest the body (which now not a little resembles an Egyptian mummy) on a spare grating. Some portion of the bedding is usually made up so as to prevent the form being too much seen. It is then carried aft and placed between two of the guns on the starboard side of the half-deck, with the union-jack thrown over all.

Next day, generally about eleven o'clock, the bell on which the half-hours are struck is tolled for the funeral by one of the quarter-masters of the watch below, or by one of the deceased's messmates, and all who choose to be present assemble on the gangways, boome, and around the main-mast, while the fore part of the quarter-deck is occupied by the officers.

While the people are repairing to the deck in obedience to the summons of the bell, the grating on which the body is placed is taken on deck by the messmates of the man who has died, and made to rest across the lee-gangway. The body is still covered by the flag, with the feet projecting a little over the gunwale, while the messmates of the deceased range themselves on each side. A rope which is kept out of sight in these arrangements is then made fast to the grating, for a purpose which will be hereafter explained.

When all is ready, the chaplain, if there be one on board, or if not the captain, or officer he may desire to officiate, appears on the quarter-deck, and commences the beautiful service, which, though but too familiar to most ears, never fails to rivet the attention even of the most rude and least reflecting.

The bell has ceased to toll, and every one stands in silence and uncovered as the prayers are read. There can be no more attentive and apparently reverent auditory than assembles on board a ship of war on the occasion of a shipmate's burial.

At the words, "we commit his body to the deep," one of the seamen stoops down and disengages the [illegible] from the remains, while the others project the grating right into the sea. The body, being loaded with shot at one end, glances off the grating, plunges at once into the ocean, and,

"In a moment, like a drop of rain,
He sinks into its depths with bubbling groan,
Without a grave, unknell'd, uncoffin'd, and unknown."

This part of the ceremony is rather less impressive than the correspondent part on land, but still there is something solemn as well as startling in the sudden splash, followed by the sound of the grating as it is towed along under the main-chains.

On a fine day at sea, in smooth water, and when all the ship's company and officers are assembled, the ceremony just described, although a melancholy one, as it must always be, is often so pleasing, all things considered, that it is calculated to leave even cheerful impressions on the mind.

CITY MISSIONS.

WITH the rapidly increasing wealth of the metropolis there has been a gratifying advance in the scale of benevolent giving, and in no direction is there better evidence of this than in the large and well-appointed buildings for missionary purposes which have been erected by our charitable citizens within a few years past. Many of our readers are familiar with the operations of the New York City Mission, the oldest union organization in the field, and know in general that the band of missionary men and women who are constantly going their rounds of love and mercy are accomplishing a vast amount of good. But not many of our citizens know so well that the friends of this cause, being desirous of giving to the poor more commodious and attractive places of worship, lately commenced a building fund for the purpose, and have already raised $100,000 and upward, one-half of which has been expended in the erection of Olivet Chapel and Parsonage in Second Street, and the Lebanon Chapel in Columbia Street. The real estate now held by the society is valued at $250,000, and is entirely free and unincumbered. The Executive Committee, of which Rev. Dr. HOWARD CROSBY is Chairman, composed of active pastors and influential business men connected with eight different religious denominations, are desirous of securing a permanent location for the oldest mission of the city, in the First Ward, and also for promising missions in the Fifth, Sixth, and Fourteenth Wards; but the very high prices asked for property have delayed these enterprises.

Other missions in the city have been pushing forward in the same line, as the Methodist City Mission, the Howard Mission, the missions of the Fourth Avenue Presbyterian Church, the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church, the Holy Trinity Episcopal Church, the Collegiate Reformed Church, the Wilson Mission, the Young Guardian Mission, and others. If any of our men of wealth will look into this mission work, and see the practical philanthropy at work in these mission stations and chapels, we are sure they will be well satisfied with the character of the ventures that have been already made, and will be encouraged to give still more liberally for the extension and growth of these most indispensable and worthy objects.

MR. JACKSON, the Secretary of the City Mission, has, in his valuable reports, given all particulars of the various operations of these city missions and their valuable results; and any of our readers desiring further information of their plans and purposes will do well to call at the Room No. 30 Bible House.

A NECESSARY REFORM.

THE unfortunate situation in which the St. Thomas treaty has been left, and the rejection of the Alabama treaty, have shown in the strongest light a defect of our constitutional system. The Ambassador of the United States, it now appears, may not in the least represent the Government of his country; and the inevitable result is, that no other country will care to treat with him hereafter unless it is known to be backed by a representative. Look at the two instances of which we have spoken.

The Secretary of State, who has no seat in the Senate, and who acts independently of it, instructs the Embassador whom the Senate has confirmed to propose a negotiation to the Danish Government. He says, indeed, that the treaty must be finally ratified by the Senate, but the Danish Ministry knows that it must be ratified also by the Danish Assembly; and as the Minister has no representative, no statesman considers the Embassador to whose appointment the Senate has consented as the representative of the Senate. The negotiation proceeds. The terms of the treaty are finally adjusted. The Danish Minister signs, the United States Minister signs. The Dane is in the confidence of the Danish Assembly, and his signature binds that body, except for reasonable cause. The United States Minister is in the confidence of nobody but the Secretary of State, and his signature binds nobody whatsoever.

Or take the case of the English treaty, and let us put it in the most plausible way. The claims for settlement arising from the Alabama and other ships have been for a long time before the English Government. It knows that the subject is a very one, but must nevertheless be settled. The United States Secretary of State has suggested arbitration, but nothing has been settled; that remains for a new Embassador. Now the British Government may be presumed to be aware of the conflict between the President and the Senate. It sees that the quarrel is bitter; and again it may be supposed to prefer a treaty to leave the negotiation to the Administration about coming into power as really representing the will of the people. But the President one day nominates to the Senate an Embassador or Minister to England whom the Senate unanimously confirms. It is the same Senate which has already rejected other candidates—the Senate which will pass upon all the nominations of General GRANT, and whose unanimous voice must be interpreted to mean that in the sentiment of the nation for which mainly the new Minister is sent he represents the authority that will finally decide. It is perfectly well known who will be the Minister is to undertake; on it be supposed that the Senate would unanimously confirm him unless it acknowledged him as its representative?

The Minister reaches London, and negotiations begin. The proposal for arbitration came originally from the United States, and England accepts it. The Minister, unanimously confirmed by the treaty-ratifying authority, proposes the terms of a treaty; and England accepts them. The Ministers sign the treaty; and what is the necessary presumption? Certainly it can be nothing else than that as Lord STANLEY, representing the final authority in England, speaks the will of that authority, so Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON, representing the same authority in his country, and by express election, also represents the will of that authority. But the fact is as in the case of Denmark. Lord STANLEY is overborne by Lord RUSSELL, and DISRAELI a binds nobody. The treaty which the unanimously-appointed agent of the Senate has proposed, and which had the Senate's serious ratification, accepted, is thrown by the Senate contemptuously out of the window with a loud cry of something very like bad faith against the power to which its agent proposed the treaty.

Can any situation be more absurd? Can any self-respecting nation treat at last with the agent of which the United States until it knows whether the principal is in the least bound by him, and whether the principal will consider himself at liberty to vote against the treaty of his fully-authorized representative? Would not Lord CLARENDON, for instance, be justified in saying to Mr. MORLEY, if he should find in saying to Mr. MORLEY, if he should find in saying to Mr. MORLEY, if he should find the process will be slow. That severe calamity is now showing its results. The large population of Great Britain is partially withdrawn from the consumption of English manufactures, and the excess of production has been thrown upon other countries at reduced prices. The drought has been met by strict economy, and now, as it becomes more severe, by extensive emigration.

England unquestionably desires to hold her population, and particularly her skilled population, for the purpose of augmenting her own productions; but she can not help the drain which is now enriching the United States.

CANDOR WANTED.

We can certainly never arrive at a fair settlement of any international difficulty if we permit ourselves to indulge in the kind of imputation which the London correspondent of the Tribune bestows upon Senator GRIMES, and which appears in so many of the comments upon the recent address of GOLDWIN SMITH.

Senator GRIMES being in London, and reading the daily articles of the London press upon Mr. SUMNER'S speech and the Alabama difficulty, very properly writes to the Times a letter in which he calmly states the facts of the case as he understands them. Mr. GRIMES says, first, that he does not now see how opposition in this country to go to war with England than now; that the Senate merely agreed to the conclusion of Mr. SUMNER'S speech that the treaty should be ratified, not to the arguments by which he reached that conclusion; that Mr. SUMNER himself asked that the injunction of secrecy from the debate be removed; that the conduct of Members of the British Legation, coupled with the proposed method of arbitration, gave at least an appearance of probable unfairness in the decision; that the desire of the annexation of Canada is by no means universal in the United States, and that there is no party which would think for a moment of a resort to force; that Mr. MOTLEY will bring instructions of the most pacific character only; and, to quote the words of Senator GRIMES:

"That the offense in the eyes of Americans is not 'that she conceded belligerent rights to the Confederacy at a time when the Southern States had apparently proclaimed themselves an independent Power,' or that she recognized their belligerent rights at any time, but that we did not accept the full validity of her citizens during the rebellion. Their real grievance is that the Alabama, built and fitted out in an English port, never ran into a Confederate port so as to acquire the legal character of a Confederate belligerent, but only or otherwise; that she was in truth an English vessel, sailing from a British port under the British flag, manned by British seamen in every where cordially received, supplied, and coaled at British ports, with each hospitality usual to vessels of American cruisers; that she never had any other home than that of Liverpool, from which she was originally departed, and remained, in law and conscience, a British vessel until she sank beneath the waves. This is our grievance. All else is the embellishment of the advocate and orator."

In writing this most temperate and candid letter, in which, as is seen in the extract which we quote, the positive claim of the United States against England is clearly and admirably stated—the only claim which can be the reasonable basis of a treaty—the London correspondent of the Tribune attacks Mr. GRIMES in these words:

"Mr. SENATOR GRIMES is at his old work of giving aid and comfort to the enemy. Is there any being in this case not Mr. ANDREW JOHNSON, but the party in England that hates America."

Is every body who does not implicitly accept slanders giving aid and comfort to the enemy? Is nothing but a stout and persistent assertion that our own view is in all its details the only just and conceivable and patriotic view to be regarded as treating the subject in the "ANDREW JOHNSON vein?" Is it necessary in order to be an honest American to be a credulous partisan of a country, or the diligent promoter of bitter hostility? President WOOLSEY, of Yale College, a recognized authority upon international law as it is called, says that Mr. SUMNER is remarkably well-informed upon this question, "he is not a wise man, though of excellent intentions." Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH differs with Mr. SUMNER. Has he therefore been bought with British gold? Is he in dark and secret conspiracy with the LAIRDS? Or is he possibly as honest and as patriotic American citizen speaking upon a subject in which he is especially learned, and upon which he has the best right to speak with authority?

So with GOLDWIN SMITH. He is a man as fully in sympathy with the best spirit and the highest aims of this country as a native born. He is thoroughly familiar with the facts of the case, and as an Englishman he most warmly deprecated the escape of the Alabama, and deplored the inevitable consequences that must follow. Drawn to this country by a real sympathy, and seeking convenient opportunities for certain literary labor, he attracted visitors to the youngest and one of the most promising of our schools of learning. He gives his experience, his accomplishments, to its service. He engages in the course of instruction without any remuneration whatever, and he presents to the library of the university his own large and admirable and valuable library. In every way that a man can prove the sincerest sympathy and the most unselfish interest in a country GOLDWIN SMITH has shown them, and when he speaks to avoid a complication which every wise man ought to deplore, and speaks in the most honorable and candid manner, he is saluted with a loud jeer as a man utterly ignorant of America and the American people, and his patriotism and his candor and the critics coolly tell him that he had better go home at once. But which is the more worthy of a man, and which shows a knowledge of the true American—the tone of GOLDWIN SMITH or the tone of the remarks attributed to General BUTLER? Whose spirit tends to honorable peace? Which speaks as a civilized statesman?

We have always said in these columns that the British recognition of rebel belligerency seemed to us needlessly hasty, and that the haste showed an unfriendly feeling. But Benjamin WOOLSEY—quite as patriotic and quite as well-informed upon the subject as any journalist can justly claim to be—says that at the time the recognition was issued a neutral might conclude without malignity or warped judgment that a state of war existed in this country. And President WOOLSEY agrees with Senator GRIMES and GOLDWIN SMITH that the substantial question of the controversy is whether due precaution was taken to arrest the Alabama. Here if we enter upon the discussion of the subject by declaring these men, as in the one case, to be foolishly frightened, and in the other to be malignant, we are glad to do at the beginning, there can be no satisfactory end to the debate. The case demands arguments, not epithets.

THE JUDICIAL ERMINE IN NEW YORK.

Jesse CHOATE, to whose remarkable conduct in a recent case of fraud we called contempt of court we alluded last week, has discharged the prisoners that he held, and upon the same affidavits that originally offered. The prisoners, by advice of counsel, abandoned the writ of habeas corpus, having ascertained that it would not hasten their examination. Indeed the purpose for which the writ of privilege of the writ was abolished by the Judge. Denouncing counsel for supporting prostitutes against the courts, and treating prisoners who had taken out a writ of habeas corpus for more than a fortnight in jail without examination, and arranging with his fellow-judges that the writ should be returnable only to him, the proceeding seems to be one of the most utterly absurd, if it were not so grave an outrage upon the guarantees of personal liberty, that in the unsounding record of the proceedings of modern New York courts presents.

Another glimpse at the administration of justice in the city is given in this report of a scene in the Court of Special Sessions, his Honor Justice DOWLING upon the bench. There is a boy of fourteen pleading guilty to a prisoner for a petty offense. Justice DOWLING took a sharp look at the prisoner, and then at the docket his name. "ANDREWS," replied the lawyer.

"Yes, I thought so. You are as much altered with your whiskers shaved off that I hardly recognized you." Then, raising his voice, Justice DOWLING continued in a very severe manner, "Well, Sir, you can't practice in this court. I have told you a dozen times. Now, what is your plea?"

"But, Sir," put in ANDREWS, "I am a member of the bar."

"I don't care whether you are or not," thundered the Judge. "I say you can't practice here, and that is enough."

"Will your Honor then please remand the prisoner and my partner can be ready for the defaul him?"

"I don't want your partner here. I say that I will not allow you to practice in this court. Now go!"

The lawyer, amazed, hastily made his exit.

"Prisoner," continued Justice DOWLING, "seeing that you are your own counsel, the Court discharges you."

ANDREWS is the Virginian who harangued a crowd of rioters in Lexington Avenue in July, 1863. He was tried for this crime, and sentenced by Judge NASH to three years in State Prison. Somehow he obtained a pardon before the expiration of his term of imprisonment and managed to get himself admitted to the bar. We never heard of him again until yesterday.

GIFTS AND OFFICES.

We are sorry to see some foolish insinuations in regard to the President's gifts, not openly expressed, just after the inauguration, by the papers which are hostile to him, recently revived in a journal which we had supposed to be friendly. Certain gentlemen of the late General M'CLELLAN and highly valued his services to the country gave him a house. It was a very honorable gift both to the giver and to the receivers. Certain other gentlemen give a house to General GRANT, and the same thing was true. It was a tribute of admiration which it was most proper for them to offer and for him to accept. Certain other gentlemen still, gave a house to General SHERMAN. Has General SHERMAN forfeited in any degree the confidence of his countrymen by accepting it?

Now in the case of General GRANT, is it not plain that the circumstances very naturally threw him into relations more or less familiar with those who had been so interested in him, and so desirous to show their grateful sense of his services as to make him the gift? And when he came to select persons for offices he chose from the men whom he knew, whether they had been made known to him by intimacy arising from military association in the field or in other ways. Mr. STEWART, for instance, knew GRANT well before he gave a house to General GRANT. He had also interested himself in an early designation of the General for the Presidency. They were naturally brought together. The General when in New York was much with Mr. STEWART, observing his business methods and his ability. When he nominated Mr. STEWART for Secretary of the Treasury did any man who was not determined to carp seriously suppose that the nomination was made in settlement of the house question? Because the President believed that Mr. STEWART would make a good Secretary?

So with the Secretary of the Navy. Mr. BORIE was known in a similar way to the President. The latter wished to take a member of the Cabinet from Pennsylvania who was not a politician in the usual sense, and who was not recommended by politicians for a party purpose. This may have been an unwise course, but it certainly was not a dishonest course, and it was exactly what a majority of the best men in the country hoped that the President would do. He therefore selected from Pennsylvania a gentleman whom he generally knew and trusted. Does any body again seriously suppose that General GRANT appointed Mr. BORIE because Mr. BORIE had been one of several to present him a house in Philadelphia?

Of course the coincidence offers a fair chance for an enemy, but not for a friend. The presumption is simple enough. A gives B a valuable present. B gives A an honorable office. Argal, the one is a consideration for the other. But such charges against such a man, or rather such insinuations, do not deserve to make a column, are surely unworthy honorable journalists. The exigencies of party, especially in the case of the present organization, are stringent that honor and common courtesy are not to be expected. But from those who do not believe General GRANT to be a knave we have a right to expect a very little charity and criticism. Is it fair to insinuate such a charge? Is it manly by such pretenses to destroy confidence in an honest man?

SCHOOLS AND RELIGION.

A correspondent of the New York Times, writing in the interest of the Roman Catholic movement against the free-school system of this State, says that he does not object to the claim that the State should educate the children in all that makes good citizens, but that he does assert that the State refuses to take the necessary measures to make them good, that is, and good Christians, and therefore that it can not make them good citizens. This means merely that only religious men are good citizens, and that the State does not provide religious instruction.

Now the State does not claim that it ought to provide religious men at all, but makes good citizens, for that is wholly impracticable. If it did make christians, however, there could certainly be no ground of argument for sectarian instruction; for if they would surely make bad citizens it would be a system of education that by isolation deepened sectarian lines, and divided society into a multitude of hostile religious camps. The claim of State education is that a certain amount of practical knowledge, not of theological dogma, nor of moral specials, but of morals and the good order and economy of society. Education, in the view of the State, belongs to the Police Department. The State is interested that every citizen shall be orderly, not that he shall be Jew, nor Baptist, nor Presbyterian, nor Unitarian, nor Roman Catholic, nor Episcopalian, nor Universalist in any way whatever. The State is not sectarian, but it protects all sects. It builds court-houses and jails, but not churches. If you are an orderly man you may believe what you will, so far as the State is concerned. Formerly, and in other countries now, as recently in Austria and in Spain, and in England, the present time, the State has a religion, and undertakes to promote religion by the influence of the State. And to that very action the degradation of the mass of the people in those countries is largely attributable; while in England it has been only successfully resisted by the sturdy good sense of the people.

To ask in this country, as the Roman Catholics do, that their share of the school-tax shall be given to them to be expended as they please in schools of their own, is simply to ask that the whole body of tax-payers shall not decide in what manner the common good can best be promoted. It is to ask substantially, and at last, that each tax-payer shall decide how his tax shall be expended. It is, moreover, to demand that the State shall maintain and fortify sectarian dissension. This was plainly seen some years ago in Michigan, when this favorite project of the Roman Catholics was introduced into the Legislature of that State. The Bishop of another Church highly approved the plan, and he arrived at the capital with his proposition that his church also should have its share. The Legislature paused and asked, "Why not the Methodists, the Presbyterians, the Baptists, the Congregationalists also; and if these also, then what?" And the Legislature very wisely declined to adopt so foolish a measure.

NOTES.

We gave in our issue for May 15 an illustration of the Sunday School Convention held at Newark, New Jersey, April 28, 29, and 30. Our illustration was from an excellent photograph taken on the spot by E. F. CRANE, of Newark. Accidentally the proper credit was omitted at the time. We regret the circumstance, and cheerfully take this opportunity to give the photographer the mention which he deserves, and to call attention to the very excellent photographs which furnished the basis of our representation.

The comfort and pleasure attending a visit to our Central Park this summer will be much enhanced by "the New Central Park Pleasure Carriage Service," which has been inaugurated under the auspices of Controller A. H. GREEN and the Commissioners of the Park. The regular business of this Service commenced June 1, and furnishes a ride over all the carriage-ways of the Park for 25 cents, in a carriage "of exceeding elegance, adapted to all weathers."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

The ceremony of decorating the soldiers' graves took place May 30, and was universally observed. In the evening especial memorial exercises were attended at the Academy of Music by Major-General Sickles, Commander of the Army of the Republic in the State, and by many distinguished citizens. An address was preached by the Rev. Henry W. Bellows, D.D. As on the day previous the decoration in Washington, Philadelphia, Boston, and other cities. At Cambridge, Massachusetts, General Butler delivered the memorial address.

As the steamer Russia, from Liverpool, was coming up the bay on the morning of May 26, the latter was run down by the steamer Hyde Manor, from Marseilles, which struck the Russia on the starboard side, just abaft the bulk-head. The ship was struck on the port side, and was left in a few minutes, and was also submerged in water reaching up to her lower yards. The steamer was in charge of a pilot at the time. No lives were lost.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Two elections in France have as a rule resulted in the victory of the Government candidates. The official papers proclaim it a triumph of intelligence, the old parties, and leave the Liberal Empire opposed by only a few revolutionary candidates.

The Spanish Cortes has lately been debating the Cuban question. Señor CASTELAR declared that the great Republican orator, and if Spain had followed the example of England in the settlement of Ireland, by granting the liberties which the Colonies now claim for themselves, Cuba would in all probability have been preserved. Marshal SERRANO replied that Captain-General DULCE was doing everything in his power to secure upon the Government of Cuba, but party-spirit divided some of the inhabitants in their opposition to the Home Government. By the recommendation of the regional decree of 1868 had been granted, "the moral disorder was disappearing very rapidly." That would be carried out. Cuba would remain where it had

CHAPTER XXXIV.

HETTY AT LAST.

So Rebecca hung on, doing the work which God in his kindness had given her. Waiting by the tide, month after month, for a message from the sea.

When the wind was very wild, and the rain beat upon the glass, she would get up, and do as she had now so often seen the sailors' wives do, walk up and down the room with her arms tightly folded; thinking of the man she loved at sea.

It was a very wild furze night six months after she came home, and was very late. She had not long come in, after making one of some eighty women who had been out in the rain and the wild harbour to see an accident. Captain Moriarty had driven from his moorings in the gale, and caused an alarm as great as if the Houses of Parliament were afire. Rebecca had ended with a hearty laugh when all things were put straight, and had come home to her unwary supper of bread and cheese; and the wind was very wild, and her heart was very heavy, and she sat her supper walking up and down, and, I am very much afraid, crying.

The door was opened, and a voice coming from a figure which she could not see, said, "If you please, Miss, old Job Partridge, of the Mary Ann, is much worse, and wants to see you immediate."

"I will be with you directly," said Rebecca; "how far is it?"

"About a mile straight in the teeth of the wind, and it is raining cats, dogs, marlin-spikes, and copper sheathing," said the voice.

"I will be with you in two minutes," said Rebecca. "I have been out and got my hair wet, and have been drying it. Mr. Moriarty has lost his moorings, but he has been brought up by a hawser from the Elizabeth now. I will not detain you an instant."

The voice, in the most emphatic manner, "You will do," and out of the darkness came a young woman, who introduced herself, who put two hands on Rebecca's shoulders, and looked up, and Rebecca knew in an instant that she was looking on a most handsome splendid Hun her own.

She was perfectly amazed, and stammered out, "Is it, is it—"

"Of course it is, my dear soul."

"Is it Hetty?" said Rebecca.

"Of course it is, my dear. Who else did you think it was? Have a good look at it then. Look at me," said Hetty; and Rebecca did so, with fixed eyes and open mouth, for this mysterious long-expected Hetty was the strangest creature she had ever seen in her life.

She was dressed in close-fitting sailor's blue, and had just taken off a sailor's tarpaulin hat off her head, and shaken out her hair; it was a crown of dark chestnut. In features, more particularly in the original beautiful nose, turned lightly back up at the corners, she resembled very closely Sir Joshua's Muscipula; as she shaded her great hazel eyes with her hand, to get a good look at Rebecca, Rebecca saw that she was like her father, but also like some one she had never seen.

Rebecca was dazed and stunned at the apparition. She had loved beauty deeply, and been told that Hetty was beautiful; but she was not prepared for this. And where did the girl get that wondrous, tender, pathetic expression from, almost as strange as beauty? Rebecca soon knew whence came that look.

"Rebecca, dear," said Hetty, "God is sending Jack and I a little one. Will you nurse mine until it is born, and I am fit to go afloat again?"

That was all she said, and Rebecca said exactly nothing at all; but she laughed such a long, long laugh that Hetty laughed again; and kissing her, and shaking the rain-drops from her hair, sat down upon her easy-chair and demanded tea.

The semi-time of Rebecca's life had been hard and bitter, but the harvest was beginning now. Judgment, grief, trouble, anxiety, but in deep glorious happiness. She was getting a share in the great life which was moving about her. The arrival of this strange, beautiful mountain-lass, for the wild sea was now, to her, a deeper, more intense pleasure than all the castles, boroughams, opera-boxes, and diamonds that any lady ever had in this world.

"I think we shall be very fond of one another," said Hetty.

"That is quite my opinion," said Rebecca. "Where have you been, Hetty?"

"Slopping round," said Hetty. "I am perfectly sick and tired of these clipper ships; and I declare most positively, that when we get a-going to happen has happened I will never put my kit on board of another. Jack, thank Heaven, has got one of the old sort."

"Has he got a ship?" said Rebecca, eagerly.

"Certainly he has," said Hetty.

"And where is Jack gone?" asked Rebecca.

"Callao, for orders," said Hetty; "that, he says, expresses sailors' language, Greek Kalends. Ships cleared for Callao never know where they are going: it may be Melbourne, and it may be Hong-Kong, or as likely as the other. I shall not see him for a year."

"Are you not impatient?" asked Rebecca.

"My good soul, if sailors' wives were to get impatient they would go mad. I have had my heart and soul at the feet of one sailor, and you have laid yours at the feet of another. Sailors' wives must know how to wait and suffer. And if you have a common religion, if you believe that there is no cloud at death between you and your husband, you can get through any thing. That is the only link between Jack and myself."

"Yes," said Rebecca, and there was a great deal in her Yes.

"Now," said Hetty, "I am going to tell you a thing which will make you very angry and make you hate me. Jack has openly joined the Church of England, and I have gone with him."

"Why not, Hetty?" said Rebecca, turning her face to Hetty.

"Why not?" said Hetty. "Why, of all the indiscretions I ever committed, this is the worst. I hope you will not be so foolish as I have been."

"Why not?" said Rebecca.

"Because you would cut the last ground from under my father's feet. Rebecca, you have a noble soul committed to your care, for which you will have to answer at the Day of Judgment. Follow him—do not lead him. A lad man is an ill thing. I have been to sea, and I know."

Here there was an interruption: Mrs. Tryon stood at the door.

"Now then, Miss Turner; you are talking her to death. Het, old girl, how are you? You did right to come home to Miss Turner and I, though Miss Turner is a fool."

"I have known that for a long time," said Rebecca, quietly; for Mrs. Tryon had called to a fool in a way which did not give offense. There are different ways of calling people fools.

"Where is your man gone?" said Mrs. Tryon to Hetty.

"To Callao for orders," said Hetty.

"He is a fool, and you were a fool for letting him go," said Tryon.

"Don't talk nonsense, my dear soul," said Hetty. "You may think it so, but we do not."

"Is he going through the Straits or round the Horn?" asked Tryon.

"Round the Horn," said Hetty. "His ship would never beat through the Straits, she is bad to get about. I did not like his crew myself, for many Malays. I like the ship altogether, and the ship is, I doubt, wet; and in my opinion, Mrs. Tryon, she is extremely over-spread. Why, Jack told me that she would carry a leader her main-yard lift by sheer rolling, and dropped it on to the slings."

"Those lifts are all rubbish," said Mrs. Tryon.

"I know that," said Hetty; "but that does not make amends for Jack's carrying on round the Horn with iron lifts. And his ship's bows are too fat at the load-line, I doubt, though she would lift well with a reefed foresail, when she is going before it. As for laying her to in a gale of wind, she will be a handful if ever he when Jack proposed to do it I should get out and walk."

"Look at her," said Tryon, quietly.

It was Rebecca to whom she called attention. She had gone to sleep on the floor with her head in a hassock. "Poor child," said Mrs. Tryon. "Have you heard any thing of Morley, dear?"

"Speak very low," said Hetty. "Pa has gone on to Plymouth to see the mail, and the Sydney Herald says that they are all dead."

"You don't believe it, dear?" said Mrs. Tryon.

"Of course I don't," said Hetty. "Jack says that he don't believe a thingamy of it."

This is the way sailors' wives talk: confidentially, ladies and gentlemen. Of course they ought not to do so, but they do it.

"I don't believe it, Tryon, more of it," said Tryon. "But that Patagonian coast is a awful bad 'un. Look how sweet she sleeps, pretty love, pretty dear!"

CHAPTER XXXV.

A MESSAGE FROM THE SEA.

There came a long time now while Rebecca and Hetty abode together like Ruth and Naomi. And all dangers, sorrows, and cares was the presence of a necessity greater than her own. Her own self was dead and ended, and she had three others, Morley, Hetty, and Hartop; not to mention three dozen others in the swarming, seafaring population all around her.

To lose sight of self absolutely for one moment is to have lived for one moment.

Rebecca lived much now, for she never had time to think about herself. She was the very person who took her away from herself most was that bonny, shrewd, beautiful Hetty.

Mrs. Tryon had a fight with Hetty about her treatment of Rebecca; but after a long engagement of an hour Tryon retired, with all her breasts shot away (for Tryon colors flying), leaving Hetty the victor. As I can not, from want of space, give an account of the whole of this great battle, I will give the score of it, so that ex pede Herculem, the reader may judge what the beginning of the fight was like.

"You worry the girl to death," said Tryon.

"I want to," said Hetty. "I want to take her out of herself, and make her think of me, not of my father."

"Why?"

"Because I am beginning to believe that my father is in heaven," said Hetty. "The Society are getting very anxious."

"But making her fetch errands in such weather," said Mrs. Tryon; "you will kill her."

"She is not made of sugar," said Hetty.

Rebecca was in at this moment, and as an illustration of how much Hetty meant to attend to Mrs. Tryon, she said to Rebecca, coolly:

"I want sardines for my supper. I am to have every thing I fancy, and I fancy them. And the sardines at the corner shop are no thing but pilchards, and taste of hair-oil. Go up the street, and get a box of the small ones at Elmes'."

And Rebecca went out into the rain again, without one word.

"I call it shameful usage," said Mrs. Tryon.

"It is the system I mean to pursue with her, said Hetty, coolly."

When Rebecca came back with the sardines Hetty called her to her.

"Rebecca, Mrs. Tryon has been saying that if I try you as I do you will lose your love for me. Is that so?"

"She must be perfectly foolish," said Rebecca, sharply. "I wish you would try me more. You don't think it, Hetty?"

"Not I. I will tell you the whole truth. If sailors' wives brood and think of nothing but themselves and their husbands they will go mad. Unless you try and think you will never be happy. I have no letter from Jack, from Valparaiso."

"And I have none from Alfred."

"Self again. You should think of me, not of my father. I told you that pa was gone to Patagonia, and you don't suppose that there are letter-boxes there. You should think about me."

But Rebecca cried very much indeed, and Hetty let her alone for a little.

"Becky, dear," she said at last, "I got me to bed, and sent for Samuel Warnford. I am going to be ill." And Rebecca got her to bed and sent for the doctor.

Meanwhile Hetty had leaned her face to the wall, weeping silently. "Father and Jack both together. O God, in thine infinite mercy, judge me not too harshly!"

On the morrow, Hetty, lying in the same bed where Mr. Turner had died, and watching the ships pass and repass on the river, lay with a brave loy on her bosom, and was quite quiet and well, saying very little indeed.

Presently there came to her eyes with a piece of news which she imparted to Rebecca. "Jack Hartop has lost his ship."

Rebecca was startled by the news that she found herself wondering whether Jack Hartop had dropped his ship down an area railings, or lost it at cards, or left it accidentally in a railway carriage, or gone on shore forgetfully and let it sail away by itself into unknown seas; when Mrs. Tryon, shortly, sharply—

"You are wool-gathering. Don't do it. He has lost his ship on Cape Northumberland, and his certificate with it."

"It will kill her," said Rebecca.

"Yes, it will kill. But she must not be. Now you understand."

"Yes, I understand," said Rebecca, and Mrs. Tryon withdrew.

It was a long time before Hetty was well enough to be told any thing about Hartop's misfortune. It was a still longer time before Rebecca said one word to her about it.

She did not know what to do. God solved the problem for her, however, in this way:

Hetty had got about, on the wharf, and by the river, with her baby, impressing on the newly-formed mind of the young gentleman the images of ships. Otherwise the life went on among the sailors wives left waiting for some who came home, and some who did not; for some who came back broken, though as dear as ever; and for some who never came back at all. It had come on a fine morning, and Rebecca had caught Hetty on the wharf, and pulled her into the house.

"I have news," said Rebecca.

"You need not trouble to say that, Becky," said Hetty. "Is it pa or Jack?"

"Jack," said Rebecca. "He has lost his ship and been court-martialled."

Then he is not dead?" said Hetty.

"Not that I am aware of."

"Has Jack lost his certificate?" asked Hetty.

"No, Hetty. Hetty, be quiet and I will tell you every thing. Be quiet, Hetty, and be quiet."

"I am quite quiet," said Hetty. "If Jack is alive and well, what care I? You say that he has not lost his certificate. If they had dared to take it away I would have tweaked Dr. Keane's nose as he presented it."

"But I have to read you something," said Rebecca.

"You had better read it then," said Hetty.

Rebecca read, in a very fluttering voice, from a newspaper, The Melbourne Argus:

"The Bonrd which sat on Captain Hartop, of the ship Flying Cloud, have reported.

"It appears that Captain Hartop was keeping his due course, when, being warned by the sudden fall of the mercury, he made for sea, but in consequence of the calm which preceded the hurricane which has devastated our southern shores, he was unable to get way on his ship. After the cyclone (or whirlwind) came there was no possibility of saving her. Up to this point the Board consider that Captain Hartop's conduct was most seamanlike."

"Thank you for nothing, quoth the gallipot," said Hetty, quietly. "If Jack could not fiddle his ship out of it by any other reason, I should like to see the man who could."

"After the ship struck on the reef under Cape Northumberland the conduct of Captain Hartop was beyond all praise for which they can find words. His personal prestige among his sailors seems to have been so great that on this terrible night they passed quietly into the boats, in the inlmer water to the lee of the reef, without noticing that he himself had remained with his first mate, Green—"

"I shall remember that young man," said Hetty, with a slight flutter in her voice; "go on, Rebecca. Jack, Jack, you are a sailor!"

"—In which position he was under some any chance of saving any thing for the underwriters in case of the gale moderating, taking his chance of swimming on shore. The Board wish it to be distinctly understood that their opinion is that during this unhappy wreck, and in the long march between the place of the wreck and the nearest settlement, Captain Hartop conducted himself from first to last like a splendid British sailor."

"Of course Jack did," said Hetty, quietly. "Do not I know him? Jack is a man of pluck and energy. Jack is a sailor, every inch of him. I suppose his owners will give him another ship at once, after that report. If they don't, I will spend a little time at their office not very pleasantly for them."

And she looked Rebecca straight in the face as cool as a cucumber. And Rebecca was deeply puzzled.

"Well, and so that is the whole of it, is it?" said Hetty. "I am glad that the best of a ship is at the bottom of the sea without drowning Jack or any of the men. Is there any thing more to tell?"

Rebecca was getting more and more puzzled. "Has she a heart at all?" she said to herself.

"Yes, Hetty," she said; "but I do not know how to tell it." 'The Panama route—"

"There was no need to say more, or to question whether Jack Hartop had a heart. The door opened quickly, and in the open doorway stood Jack Hartop.

Hetty stood up and spread out her ten fingers toward him. In less than a second her pretty arms were round his neck, and he was hugging her like a bear. She said, "Love, love, love, it?" and he said, "Darling, darling, darling," which is folly the most incurable. But if you will bring me any gentleman who will affirm on his oath that he has never made a fool of himself to the same extent, I will politely decline that gentleman's acquaintance.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

ANOTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SEA.

The life thus enriched by two whom she loved went smoothly for Rebecca. Not cheerfully, for there came no word of Mr. Morley at all. Hetty and Hartop spoke continually about him, always planning for him when it was her, Hetty would say, "I doubt he is cold, poor dear, there where he is;" and Hartop would say, "Ay, it is winter there now." At dinner Hetty might say, "I doubt he has no lamb and green peas to-day, poor man;" and Hartop would say, "No, he will be having fish and salt beef for his dinner. It is not bad, but not so good as this."

So they would talk to her, keeping his image perpetually before her mind in their both having given up all hope.

They kept from her the news that the missionary ship had been lost, but that a few of the missionaries were heard to be alive three months after. They kept from her their knowledge of the bitter, desolate coast of Patagonia, and Hetty had so persistently forced on her the maxim that sailors' wives must not fret, that she believed her, and abode in quiet, busy, and not unhappy, ignorant of the chances of the sea.

But it is to be feared it became evident that Jack Hartop was growing to be a person of great consequence among a certain great and powerful society. He had been long absent from Plymouth, and she had been to a May meeting of it, presided over by a certain great earl; and one day in these times she found this society's whom she knew by sight, talking eagerly and familiarly with Jack Hartop.

She found him say, "It is certainly a splendid offer—a splendid offer. And as a sailor, Mr. Hartop, you think that the yacht is big enough."

"Bless your lord, I should sail her any where! Two hundred and eighty tons!—why, she is a frigate."

"It is somewhat singular that Lord Ducetoy, who is not even a subscriber, and a—"

At this moment Rebecca passed with a slight bow and went on.

"Who is that young lady?" said Lord S.

"Miss Turner."

"Oh; I was saying that it seems singular that a mere sportsman like Lord Ducetoy should interest himself so deeply in a mission like this, as to lend his yacht on short notice, and offer to pay a picked crew out of his own pocket, on condition of your commanding the expedition."

"My lord," said Hartop, "it is easily accounted for. Lord Ducetoy is cousin to Miss Turner, and Miss Turner, and Lord Ducetoy was under the deepest obligations to her father for saving his property from the Philpott smash."

"But what has Miss Turner to do with it?"

"She is engaged to be married to Morley, and she does not know what you and I do."

"God help her in her grief!" said Lord S., rising his hat solemnly.

"Amen," said Jack Hartop.

"When can you sail?"

"Well, in consequence of this offer of Lord Ducetoy's, I can get to sea in a week. If they are alive, they are there by Lord Ducetoy's directory."

"Under God," said Lord S.

"Under God, I mean," said Jack. "But he has saved his own way or another two months of valuable time."

"It is odd to me."

"By-the-by, my lord, Miss Turner is to know nothing of Lord Ducetoy's gift."

"God go with her!" said Lord S., and so they parted.

"Rebecca," said Hetty to her, next morning, "Jack has got another ship."

"A good one?"

"A splendid one. A missionary ship. United Missionary Society. The U. M. S. have picked him out. And I am going too."

"I wish I was," said Rebecca; "but I am so glad for Jack. I can not go, for Alfred might come while I was away, and would be very sorry to miss me."

Hetty went quietly out of the room, humming

a tune, as if to fetch something, went up stairs, and threw herself on her bed in a fury and tempest of tears. She believed—as we all did—that she was bound on a quest for some relic or remnant of the dead, left carelessly by wolf or the hardly less cruel savage.

Jack, however, had given his orders that Hetty was to be ready in six days, and so there was fine stitching, and sewing, and snipping, with not much talk to take about matters. The yacht had come round from Cowes. It was to sail on Saturday, and on Friday, all day long, Rebecca was working in Hetty's cabin. She thought to herself, "What a beautiful place!" Indeed it was, for it was the cabin which Lord Dacotey had decorated for his young wife.

She heard Lord Dacotey's voice in the main cabin, and Hetty's voice who talked to him. She could not help hearing.

"My love," said the lady, "I quite agree with you; by giving up our cruise the society gets two months. I do not regret."

"But I had her decorated for you, love—with for Channel work: and she is going to the ocean."

"Well," said Lady Dacotey, "I frankly and freely give my decorations to the ocean. My husband has done a generous and a beautiful deed, for the sake of a noble woman; that is worth all decorations to me."

They did not know she was on board, and they did not see her; but she heard them, and after a time understood what Lady Dacotey meant. She hid from them, and it was only after the schooner had sailed that she knew that the noble woman, spoken of by Lady Dacotey, was no other than her own wife.

Hetty dismissed her very early on the Saturday morning. On the wharf was a group of the strangest people—a bishop, Lord S., and Lord Dacotey foremost—to see the schooner depart. The tug caught the schooner's hawser, and she went out through the mist into the Kent and Essex sunlight. And that was over.

Dacotey and the bishop were with Rebecca as the vessel rounded the turn in the river. "Rebecca," said Lord Dacotey, "could we have sent two better people to seek him?"

"To seek whom?"

"Morley."

"Is he dead?"

"They are gone to see," said Lord Dacotey; "it has been kept from you."

Rebecca was amazed, but quite quiet.

"My dear lady," said the bishop; "this matter has been kept from you by a consultation of many men. I was very anxious to shoot Morley, and some of us believe that there is no hope. I am not of those who think there is no hope. For I most entirely think that God has a great work in hand for Morley, and that Morley has not been taken to his rest yet. I may be wrong—who can judge God's ways?—but, my dear young lady, I believe that you will live to see Morley by your side again, doing God's work with your assistance."

"Meanwhile?" said Rebecca, calmly.

"Meanwhile," said the bishop, calmly, "do as you are doing. If you are going to meet him again on earth, you are rendering yourself more fit to meet him in heaven."

For the next nine months the inhabitants of Limehouse got familiarized to a tall and splendidly beautiful young lady, always dressed in black, who walked perpetually about among the poor, followed by a little withered lady in gray, who carried her basket, and did what the tall young lady told her with never one murmur. These two were Rebecca and Miss Soper, for Rebecca had conquered and vanquished her Soper.

Said Soper to Rebecca once, in these times, "Becky, I've tried to find out the secret of living to God; and I failed, until you showed it to me. Who showed it to you?"

"Morley," said Rebecca.

Nine months; and hope growing dead as time went on. Hope of Morley utterly gone now to her, but not to others.

She was sitting in her class of girls one day, when the bishop came in, and touched her on the shoulder. Rebecca, although unsuspecting, had that love and reverence for this bishop which, I believe, is common to all sects in the Church of Christ. She rose from her seat with her black lace shawl drooping from one shoulder, and bowed deeply. And the young creatures stared open-eyed at the spectacle of a real bishop talking to Teacher.

"I have news from the sea," said the bishop; holding out his left hand.

"Good or bad, my lord?" said Rebecca.

"That is what I can not make out," said the bishop. "We have heard from Hartop. He has recovered two, but believes Morley to be alive ten miles to the northward. Until we get his letter we know nothing."

"And when shall we get his letter?" asked Rebecca.

"Well," said the bishop, "he only allows himself ten days for exploration; and so it comes to this that he will bring his own letter."

"Then the news about Mr. Morley will be brought by Hartop and Hetty?" she said.

"That is exactly the case," said the bishop.

One summer's night—it was half past eleven —Rebecca was sitting up at some of her charity accounts, when she heard a step on the stair and sat rigid.

She knew it was Hetty's. Hetty came very quickly up the stair, threw open the door in all her full beauty, fresh from the sea, bareheaded, with the very salt on her hair. And Rebecca gave a loud wild cry, inarticulate, yet meaning much, for she saw that Hetty was not in mourning. Not one solitary scrap of black was there.

A great deal of pink ribbon, certainly; sailors love it, and so their wives wear it.

"Becky, my sweet-heart," she said, "you must keep yourself cool."

"Is there news?" said Rebecca.

"I do not know what you mean by news, Becky," said Hetty. "But if you mean that we have found pa, and got pa, and brought pa home, and that pa is standing outside the door waiting to come in, why I say you are right." And she sat down on a chair by the door, and beat her knees, and cried.

It was certainly true. From the lonely cavern on the ocean shore, death, in whose jaws he had lived so long, had given him up to love. In a moment Rebecca, even in her joy, was at her thesis. Was her frizzled hair smothered in Rebecca's, and she laughed and believed.

The news of the safety of Morley had been known in London before Rebecca knew it. The Society had met, and it was unanimously agreed that Mr. Morley should be summoned to accept the mission to Honawora as soon as his health would permit. The offer came to him the day after his arrival. He refused it, and when the health was in perfect order, and that the sooner he went the better. He waited three weeks to be married in, and then he was ready.

One day, three weeks after this, Soper, Lord Dacotey, Mr. Sperry, Lord S., the little Polish doctor, Mrs Russel, the two Tibbeys, Mr. Akin, Mr. Haghut, and Carry, and one hundred and fifty more friends, assembled in this story, went to see the great missionary ship, Ericcus, pass by out on her glorious expedition. As she passed them cheered, and they cheered her, and waited before, for on her quarter-deck stood Morley and Rebecca, Jack Hartop and Hetty.

They went away to the work which God had found them to do. Whether they lived long and died long, whether they were rich or poor, or whether they had many children or few, is nothing to us. God fitted these four people for certain work in this world, and three of them had to wait till the fourth was fit to join them. I have tried to show how Rebecca was made ready for her work. Rebecca's difficulties have been so continually before one, that some might think I ought to call my story "The Trials of Rebecca." I think, that in honor of the young lady, the reputation of whose deeds kept Rebecca firm, I will call my story Rebecca's real heroine, Hetty.

THE END.

THE MODERATORS OF THE PRESBYTERIAN ASSEMBLIES.

THE two General Assemblies of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, now sitting in this city, are presided over by the most prominent clergymen whose portraits we publish on page 372. They are the Rev. MELANCTHON JAMES JACKSON, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Biblical Exegesis in Allegheny Theological Seminary, and the Rev. PATTESON H. JONES, D.D., pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Utica, New York.

Dr. JACKSON was born at Newark, New Jersey, in 1808, graduating in the classical course in Princeton College in 1831, and was graduated with the highest honors before he was eighteen years of age. After his theological studies he remained a year assistant to Professor ADDISON ALEXANDER in the department of Hebrew. He was then called to the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, where he built up a strong congregation. In 1859 he took an executive tour through the East, from Egypt to Egypt, and through the Holy Land and Syria to Damascus, thence to Constantinople and Greece, carrying the Bible hands to the Bible lands. He has published commentaries on the Gospels, the Acts, and on other Biblical books, which have been published in Great Britain. During his tour in Europe he was elected by the General Assembly Professor of Biblical Exegesis in the Theological Seminary at Alleghany, and he is also pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania. He presided over the Old School Assembly with dignity, and has been exceedingly happy in the various professional labors which, as Moderator, he has been called to make.

The Rev. Dr. FOWLER, Moderator of the New School Assembly, is pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in the city of Utica, New York, one of the largest and strongest churches in his denomination. He has been Moderator before, at the same time with Dr. JACOBUS, and began his ministry in 1836, at Washington, D. C. Most of his Christian and literary life has been spent in Central New York.

Dr. FOWLER occupies a position of great influence in his Church as a Trustee of Hamilton College and of Auburn Theological Seminary, and as a corporate member of two religious societies, and a Commissioner for Foreign Missions. As a member of the Joint Committee on the reunion of the Presbyterian Church he has given wisdom and good sense, combined with courteous manners and a catholic, Christian spirit, made his services of great value. Dr. FOWLER is also laboriously engaged for twenty years in the care of his large congregation, has been spared from illness for a European trip on two occasions. During the last summer he represented the New School Presbyterian Church in the Assemblies of the Free Church of Scotland and the Presbyterian Church of Ireland, of which mission he presented to the Church a highly suggestive report. He is a native of Albany, New York, and is fifty-four years of age.

The two Assemblies represent an aggregate of 4186 ministers, 4300 churches, and 421,486 members, while the number of worshipers in their congregations is not less than 600,000 persons.

In 1837 these branches of one family were separated, chiefly by a different opinion was to the question of slavery; and for some years it seemed as though they would never again become one. Even then, however, there were some who deplored the schism and sought to heal it. Both bodies met one year in Philadelphia, in a personal came from one to the other for joint religious services. Instantly there rose one of the strongest contestants: "Mr. Moderator, I oppose this movement. It's only an entering wedge for union." Instantly a squeaking voice was heard exclaiming from another part of the house: "Mr. Moderator, this is the first time in my life that I ever heard of a wedge being used to effect a union."

But now the wedges are all gone. The more than five hundred delegates of these two Assemblies have come from every one New York to Northern. They have enjoyed repeated devotional services together; they have eaten salt together at the table of a common friend, one of the Moderators said at the hospitable reception arranged by the citizens of New York; they have celebrated the communion of the Lord's Supper together; and they have arranged those articles of compact which are to make them hereafter one undivided Church.

Nothing with reference to these two great Assemblies has more interested the public mind than as the prospect of this union. And we are informed that during all their sessions the delegates' entertainment was free, and constantly progressed toward this desirable consummation.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

We are always glad to give our readers any specific details respecting new enterprises which may be set on foot in our country. A few months ago a new and circulating library was opened in the city by Messrs. Brotherhead & Co., in the building of the Building Association—129 East Seventeenth Street—the general arrangements nice and tasteful, and the library commodious not for from 20,000 volumes. We received at a recent visit a very pleasant impression of the plan and purpose of the Brotherhood Library. The conditions are that libraries is intended, for in such a great city as New York there is a demand for a yet more extensive series of this kind.

The selection of books is choice; not only a good supply of standard literature, but the best current literature, both American and English, is found there. The popular American and English periodicals are upon the reading-table for the use of subscribers. When these periodicals are a week old they circulate as books. Many persons will appreciate the convenience of having their own selection of books from the shelves. Each subscriber is entitled to draw two books at a time—one of old and one new one—a book being considered old six months after publication. The actual subscription is six dollars; but a ticket which is valuable for a year and three months, or books will be issued at five cents a day by the volume. Ladies, we think, will be especially attracted by the quiet aspect of the library room, which will incline them to select at their leisure the books which they wish to sit down to while they examine the latest periodicals.

The Harvard rowers are expecting to spend a few weeks in England before the international boat-race comes off, and have planned to sail in the City of Paris, on the 16th of July. The Boston Post in commenting on their preparatory training says that "the old silly plan of limiting a man to raw beef and bread crusts, with an hlaphalf of water now and then, has at last died a natural death at Harvard, after struggling for several years, and now a rower, like a farmer or hay-maker, can eat what he set before him, asking no questions for conscience's sake."

The Cuban Fair, at Apollo Hall, has been a success. Many valuable contributions have been received from various parts of the country and from Europe: and the rich and unique tables and good music have made the whole entertainment an unusually attractive one.

West Point will be a great centre of interest for the coming fortnight. The examinations commence this week; and there will be a host of anxious cadets, and many who secretly fancy they may some time be "at" secure one of the vacancies, as well as scores of butterflies who only want to have a good time somewhere, are turning their faces thitherward. West Point is looking charmingly, and green just now. We mean nothing personal toward the cadets by the remark. We are only speculating in the remembrance of the magnificent view of the Hudson, as seen from Roe's Hotel, and the soft, rich green which carpeted the parade-ground a week ago.

The Croton Department recently awarded contracts amounting to nearly $200,000 for constructing works and laying fifty miles of pipe around in this city. The streets will be in dire confusion during the summer, if those who have contracts to execute do their work well. But how delightful it would be if our metropolis did not require such continual repairing!

A few years ago a number of portrait painters in Boston, finding business dull in midsummer, migrated to a village about half-way between Boston and Lowell, and factory portraits on large sheets of printing paper, and hung them around the walls of a room, they exhibited them as splendid portraits of persons who had died in that vicinity within the previous twenty years. Friends and relatives of the deceased recognized more than two-thirds of the "charcoal portraits," and purchased them at two dollars each!

Frenchmen have often demonstrated by experiments in Africa, that soldiers wearing their beards are much less liable to diseases of the eye than others. This is said to be due to the intimate connection between the nerves and muscles of the face and eyes.

There is a young American lady in Naples—a recent arrival—who has the misfortune to be sought in marriage by two Italian noblemen. One of them has offered himself to her father, lying like princes, counts, fortune, and titles at her feet. The style of courting is especially Italian. The suit was rejected, he still pursues. Every morning he sends in a costly bouquet. The young lady dare not walk out, for she is immediately pursued. When the young lady rides out with her parents, the Duke pursues, up hill and down, in the city and out. The Italian servants, who knows their young lady only occupies. When not assisted to the house, though he seeks admission at night, he still pursues. Agreement till the Duke are put out in the room. He is an officer in the Italian army. Wherever his command moves, it goes by the mansion, and is given strict orders that every officer and soldier shall salute the house when he passes. He threatens to shoot his rival: renews his offer every day; and can't understand what an American girl can want more than to have a coronet placed on her brow.

Washington relaxes itself a little when Congress is not in session. Residents who rented their best rooms to members and others, now remove their articles and basements, and spread themselves in more commodious apartments. Every body is "taking things easy," and having a quietly good time. Travelers, also, who happen to go to the Capital, now can get good accommodations, good seats at table, and good attendance at the hotels.

English engineers are turning their attention to under-sea tunnels. Recently they made plans again to look forward to a tunnel under the English Channel, between Dover and Calais, when it is proposed to make an Anglo-Continental Railway. A tunnel, running from a point on the north coast of Antrim, Ireland, to Glenstrom, Scotland, passing through Islay, rocky peninsula called the Mull of Cantyre. The total length of the tunnel is estimated at fourteen miles three furlongs. It is estimated that it will require about six years to construct the tunnel, and that it will cost $21,000,000.

A good story is told of a mocking-bird of great accomplishments, who could sing and whistle wonderfully. His name was "Sir Jocko," and he was valued at $200. The bird was drawn as a prize in a raffle in a gentleman of this city who knew his accomplishments, and though his musical powers would be a delight to the home circle. But, strange to say, after his removal to his new home, he took a notion of coaxing, not chickadees, or threats, or any thing that could be said to "Sir Jocko," was sufficient to open his mouth in song. He sat in all the victuals, but never a word, in the way of music, would he say in response. Things went on thus for a month, when, at the end of that time the bird was sent back to his former owner. He arrived there almost a wreck. The gentleman who had given him away in getting himself in proper array, and at the end of that time "Sir Jocko" commenced his performances, and has continued them until he has sung every note of every song he ever knew a dozen, dozen, dozen times over.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

INQUISITIVE, BUT LAME!—A man was tried, some little time back, for stealing several clocks. The defence set up was that the prisoner's gentleness was appeared for his wife's sake. That, after the prisoner had taken the clocks to his own house, he put 'em all back! The jury didn't see it!

When is a newspaper the sharpest?—When it is filed.

On vertical limb my Katie sat,
Mid matter-cap and dulcy,
While I reclined, without my hat,
And felt subsided, but not flat,
Simple, yet o'en sublime our fare—
Home-cooking, Mother Nature's fair:
Cape-sherry too, my love had there—
She Slid it—Hall and Rucker!

Stern fate! As thus, in calmest bliss,
My love and I sat eating,
She paused—what! what had I for this?
My heart 'gan wildly beating.

Breathless I sat, and what was that tear?
That cheek so deeply blushing?
That clouds brow so white and clear,
That eye so full of loathing?

"Tell me, oh tell me quick, the cause!"
Not long were kept I in doubt;
With deep drawn sigh she said, "Oh lawn!
It was the mustard did it!

The extensive authority of parents under Chinese laws is well known. A Chinese son, who had been flogged by his father, ran away for four years, shed tears in the company of one of her friends. "Why do you cry?" said the friend. "I am not at home to-day to-day. The poor woman's arm grows feebler every day!"

There was a boy of the name of Cuba, whose father died so long ago that nobody remembers him; and whose mother, Mrs. Cuba, died not long ago ever since, no one knows exactly how, partly upon odds and ends of fish and flesh. Her eldest son named Little Cuba has sent her out of his wages. Cuba has been a good deal on the whole, and has done a good deal for his mother. Lately the old lady has married again, myself and family, and has gone to settle up in the world. Now Cuba says he wants to work for himself and so he is going to buy a farm. That is all right. Let the boy have a chance.

Why is Canada like courtship?—Because it borders on the United States.

An infant prodigy of the male genus, after watching a fisherman for a short time yesterday one day, and hearing the ordinary sort of remarks about it, naturally started the theory that it was a "fish-worm." "Will, I don't want to be the last angel God makes?" "Why, what do you mean?" cried an astonished relator. "I don't care, I don't," insisted the boy, "because I want to see how he makes 'em!"

A traveler says that if he were asked to describe the first sensation of a camel ride, he would say, "Take a music stool, a rocking chair, and a step-ladder, and would go, put it in a cart without springs, get on top, and drive it over the cart ruts through a stubble field, and you will then form some notion of the terrible sensation you would experience the first time you mounted a camel."

A MODEL HUSBAND.

I saw a model husband in a dream;
Where things are not exactly what they seem:
A mortal man, to sacrifice he is known!
And with his wife he lived and cherished was his own!
And for the testimony, my husband will
Be found in these few minutes at the gate,
While Jane put on her bonnet, for I must not wait
Or latter would, though waiting half an hour
For dinner; and, like Patience on a throne,
He didn't swear to and found a button gone.

THE HUMMING-BIRD.

A THOUSAND cups are filled for him;
He only pauses on the rim
A second, then away!
Balanced on tiny wings about,
His slender bill darts in and out;
In dewy freshness, white and blue,
The morning-glories blow;
He can not drain them half, I know—
Too rich to make possession true,
As only using may.

We, wanderers too, by thirst constrained—
Which of these fountains have we drained?
Make Pleasure's covalette
We miss Content, the sweetest rose.
Oh, humming-bird! if flowers were few,
And there you need to seek in each
All sweetness that might be,
Should we not joy more perfectly?
And all the heart and life to reach,
So deeper, if less wide?

Poor as we call our world, I trow
There is more sweetness in it now
Than we can enjoy.
The old has always something new;
In winter-days, when friends are few,
And there is need to search in each
All sweetness that may be,
Some depth undreamed of sympathy
May Sorrow's patient wooing reach,
Unknown to fluttering joy.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY.

CHAPTER V.

"WHEN THE CAT'S AWAY."

WHEN Azalea next awoke to consciousness she was lying in her bed at Orme House, and saw that the dingy picture which hung on the opposite wall was suffused by the light of the setting sun.

As she raised herself on her arm she was surprised by feeling a sharp flash of pain in the limb. Then she remembered with sudden clearness all that had passed—remembered first Dupas's danger, and instinctively thrust out her hand to see if he were safe in his usual place at the foot of the bed. Relieved on this score by hearing an ominous little growl indicative of his discontent at being disturbed, she withdrew her hand and began to investigate her own injuries. She found one arm very stiff and painful, but with that exception she was unhurt; she thought she would get up. It was very dull there. The room seemed more lonely as the light faded, and the roar of distant waves could be heard, but no longer now through the gloom of night.

"I wonder if they have had their tea," she said, her thoughts reverting rather wistfully to the idea of a bright fire and a hissing urn.

She had some difficulty in dressing herself, owing to the impracticability of moving her arm quickly, and in the confusion of the darkness she reassumed her old ragged dress instead of the new blue one which was placed in order in a drawer.

When dressed she propped Topaz under her unhurt arm, and crept slowly down the stairs.

She found her way to the school-room, and, pushing open the door, found, to her relief, that Conrad was the only person present.

That young gentleman was seated in an easy chair by the fire, his chair tilted, his feet resting at a convenient angle on the chimney-piece; he held a sporting paper in his hand, and was looking intensely sagacious over the intelligence it contained. He turned his head as Azalea entered, and cried, with genuine pleasure in his tone, "Hallo! you ain't killed after all, my hart, nor any thing!" You wait some time, he added, on seeing her eyes stray toward the empty chair by the other side of the fire. "He rang the bell in his grandest manner, and with dignity, which would have been impressive had it emanated from a less diminutive figure, ordered "Some tea for Miss Moore."

Azalea looked astonished. King Log was evidently ruled by King Stork for his money. Where was Miss Slater, with all her dignity of office; and where were the Misses Orme?

"Isn't it jolly?" chuckled Conrad. "We've got the school-room all to ourselves. This is a company day."

"A what?"

"A company day, you know. People to dinner, and the girls in stiff curls and stuck-out bagbies going to dance at Admiral Leigh's or Jones's, but as I don't have my hair pinched or my bows pulled out I don't take two hours over dressing. And now you've come we'll be jolly, and I'll put you up to a thing or two."

Azalea drew by the fire and watched her companion with interest as he pulled a small cane from a cupboard and began to cut it with a penknife.

Topaz also watched the proceeding furtively out of the corner of his eye. Experience had taught him that a boy with a stick was the natural enemy of a dog. But Conrad's intentions on this occasion were of the friendliest description; for after cutting off two pieces from the cane he offered one to Azalea, saying, with solemn kindness:

"Have a weed?"

"I don't know what you mean," Azalea said, looking at it doubtfully.

"Oh, what a muff! Well, have a smoke, then? Look. Do as I do. Light it at the end, and then suck in the smoke with your breath and puff it out again."

"And what's the good of that?"

"Good? No good; but it's such fun. Wouldn't the old girl be in a rage if she could see us! The gov won't allow real smoking, you know; but one day I did smoke a real cigar."

"Did you like it?"

"Well, no: it made me a little sick; and that was how the gov found it out. And he said if ever he caught me with such nastiness in my mouth again he'd give me a licking."

"But you shouldn't do it, if he don't like it," said Azalea, with a qualm of conscience.

"I won't hurt him if he don't know, will it?" answered the young philosopher. "Now here's the tea-things; I know where they keep the jampots; and we'll have a regular tuck-out."

The children sat down, and, despite her bruised arm, Azalea really enjoyed herself.

Conrad made a capital host. He dispensed Miss Slater's good things with generous hospitality. He did not mind how many of other people's jam-pots he opened, nor how much he consumed.

Presently he put down his spoon and sighed heavily.

"What is the matter?" asked Azalea.

"Oh dear!" groaned her companion. "I've been stuffing myself out with a lot of raspberry jam, and I quite forgot to look for the apricot. I know there is some, for I saw Ross cribbing the almonds out of the top one day. I say, her mouth looking sticky, and taxed her with it. She confessed because she couldn't help it, and on condition of my not poaching she promised to show me where it was."

"And did she?"

"No, the mean little beast," said Conrad, gloomingly; "she didn't. And now I've eaten the other and don't care a look for it."

Azalea sighed faintly. She had not eaten much herself, and would not have objected to apricot conserve.

"What selfish things girls are!" Conrad observed, pushing away his plate. "But I must leave you, Azalea."

"Pray don't," Azalea urged, dismally. "It will be so dull to be here alone."

"I must go and dress, you know. It don't take me so long as it does the girls; but a gentleman must wash his hands and put on a clean collar." Then, Azalea, what is the matter with it is!) I wish you'd come with me to-morrow to the downs and have some pea-shooting. My boots are no good for it, and I think I might make a handy little thing of you."

Left to her own resources, Azalea sat on the rug and pondered over the situation. She was very dull, and her arm pained her; people were unkind to her, and instead of being happier than she was at Aunt Jane's, she thought she was happy.

Down stairs she could hear the clatter of the dinner-things and the hurried movements of the servants going to and fro. Then, unexpectedly, then she thought she detected the patter of the children's feet outside; she felt her way to the door, and, opening one, saw Ross and Cecil, radiant in shiny curls, in pure-hued muslins, and glistening sashes, walking slowly up the stairs, to the very fancy basket which had evidently been filled with bonbons from the dessert-table.

The children passed on; Miss Slater's tall, thin figure preceding them, and Azalea returned to her seat by the fire. She grew tired at last, tired of the pain in her arm, tired of her upright posture, and, above all, tired of her own weariness; and so, leaning her head against the chair, she crouched down on the floor and went to sleep. She awoke to find the fire dead in the grate, Topaz shivering on her lap, and herself stiff and cold. She looked at her watch with some difficulty. It was an unusually loud burst of music up stairs, announcing the recommencement of a dance after the dinner-interval; and as she felt her way across the room she could hear the ceiling vibrate to the footsteps of the dancers.

"I'll go up and look at them," she said, desperately. "I can't stay here any longer."

She accordingly went up the staircase, where she was nearly blinded by the glare of lamps, and crept up the grand staircase which led to the drawing-rooms. She paused at the great door, and went to a small one which she remembered communicated with a sort of recess formed near a huge bay-window; then she opened it gently, and ragged, disheveled, shoeless Azalea passed into a chamber, resonant with music, radiant with light, rich with perfumes of exotics, and filled with the élite of Brighton.

CHAPTER VI.

AZALEA'S DEBUT.

"HERE'S a go!" were the first distinct words that followed the burst of music which greeted Azalea's entry into the drawing-room.

Need I say that the exclamation proceeded from Conrad, and that, pithy as it was, it expressed very tolerably the general sensation of surprise and discomfort?

Miss Slater made a dive at Azalea, catching hold of her by the arm, and with outward amiability but suppressed fury, urged her instant departure. It was a mistaken move. Azalea was scared, sleepy, and non-combative when she entered the apartment; but the touch and presence of Miss Slater's face roused all her dormant energy.

"Let me go!" she screamed, "or I'll make you!"

"Go away, Azalea!" Lord Orme said, angrily; "go away, directly, do—"

"You hear what Lord Orme says?" interposed Miss Slater. "Come with me, directly, Azalea."

She did not, however, venture to touch the child this time.

"I shall not go for you!" she said, looking defiantly into the governess's face. Then her whole manner changed, and she went up timidly to Lord Orme. "I am going," she said, in a choked voice.

She lifted up her face, and Lord Orme, glancing round at his guests, saw the keen observation which was following her movement, and heard, in imagination, the surprised murmur which would follow his caress of this beggarly-dressed child. He hesitated. Lord Orme always hesitated whenever he had a chance.

His eye and his lip formed "no," when a passer-by accidentally pushed against Azalea's injured arm, causing her to utter a sharp cry of pain. In an instant a shielding arm was round her, and she asked for kiss descended as a quick consolation to her lips. Then a richly-dressed lady who was standing by Lord Orme's side (will Lord Orme ever cease to bless Lady Di Mount-orme for that kindly tact?) took hold of Azalea's little hands, saying—

"Let the poor child come with me and get something to eat before she goes away, Lord Orme: and do come, too, and tell me how this little Cinderella got here, and all about her. I see the prince has already stolen both her shoes."

Lady Diana was unconscious that this was the child who had fallen under her wheels in the morning; had she remembered her, it would have been with the half-sick aversion she might feel to some hapless beggar who had been so far trodden on by the cruel to its death under her hoofs. She hated all ugly images of death or suffering, and she had more than once given advice at the poor-to child, contenting herself with directing her servants to make all necessary inquiries.

Talking and laughing, Lady Diana moved on with a grace all her own, enveloping nearly the whole of Azalea's little person in voluminous folds of silk.

Lady Diana paused before a buffet on which stood fruit and wine, and seating herself before it, took the child on her knee.

"How beautiful you are!" Azalea said, looking up reverently at the lovely face bent over hers.

Lady Diana laughed, not ill-pleased. The humblest offering to her vanity is ever welcome to the true queen.

There was a pause. Azalea seemed lost in meditation, and Lady Diana did not know what to say to her. She was used to feel uncomfortable—she generally did feel uncomfortable with children and dogs; it puzzled her to accommodate herself gracefully to the artificial manners. But in her face to face with a court lady or a foreign diplomatist, and who so perfectly at ease as she? Her tact, her quickness in dog's mysterious-worded greeting perplexed her immeasurably. Fortunately, she carried a small looking-glass in her pocket, and she stabbed to solace herself with the assurance of her own perfection while she awaited Azalea's next remark.

"Why do you wear these things?" the latter asked, softly touching with her finger one of the richly-worked bracelets which clasped her round throat. "Don't they make you cross? things round the neck worry me so." This was said with a lively recollection of the discarded lace frill.

"I wear them because they make me pretty, and other reasons also," Lady Diana answered, with infectious candor.

"You have not told me who Cinderella is yet," she added, hastily returning to Lord Orme to occupy a neighboring chair. "What is her name?"

"Azalea Moore," he answered, shortly.

"Azalea! what an odd name; it's a flower, isn't it? one of those yellow things that grow in pots."

Lady Diana's knowledge of flowers was chiefly confined to those specimens furnished by Hardy for her bouquets.

At that instant Lord Orme leaned over Azalea and made a gentle effort to lift her away; but Lady Diana detained her fair arm round the child's waist, and looked at both the opposite faces. A sudden suspicion lit up her grey eyes and dispelled the expression of languor. Almost as quick as her glance was the certainty of her conviction.

"Blue eyes, fair curling hair, delicate nose, short upper-lip, rather full delicate chin. Umph! Lady, of course, but how different in many wrinkles and dimples, between morning and twilight, thirteen and forty odd; but they are as like as two peas, only one's green and the other's shriveled."

It was not a poetical comparison to come from such a lovely mouth; but then we do not always talk blank verse to ourselves.

Azalea slipped down on to a stool at her feet, and looked up at the lady's face with shy and reverent eyes.

"I wonder if people who live in the stars are like you," she said, softly.

"I'm sure I don't know," Lady Diana answered, somewhat startled by the novelty of the supposition, "and how can you suppose those sort of people are like?"

"I never fancied I saw any thing more than blue eyes—they have lovely eyes."

Lady Diana smiled a conscious little look into Lord Orme's face.

"This little girl has been to star-land," she said, gayly.

"Indeed!" Lord Orme answered, absently.

"Yes," continued the lady, with a slight touch of sarcasm in her voice; "but her education has evidently been neglected. How is it that little Rosa had taken such a flight heavenward, she would have noted a variety of interesting things—new constellations of new names, and worn, for instance; whether the little girls she met moved in the first circles of the star-world, whether their sashes stood out and their hair curled properly, whether they were High-Church or Low-Church, et cetera; but this narrow-minded little creature's dreams of new stars passed down on her, which, for beauty, she says, resemble my own. There was a touch of pathos in the tender tone of self-love in which the lady spoke, and the appeal was too direct not to penetrate even Lord Orme's somewhat obtuse faculties, and he smiled in spite of himself.

"It is evident that a perfect taste is not necessarily the result of culture," he said, gallantly. "I shall think very highly of the judgment of visitors to the stars in future."

"You are looking tired," Lady Diana said, suddenly addressing Azalea. "Poor little thing, I must not keep you up too late!"

Azalea looked up to object that she was not at all tired, but something in the lady's face told her that her absence was desired.

"Thank you for being so beautiful and kind," she said, earnestly; then she slipped away, not venturing to ask another caress of Lord Orme. She had seen the hesitation in his manner on the previous occasion.

She felt very small and shabby indeed when she was removed from her temporary throne of glory on Lady Diana's knees, and cast a wistful look behind her, as though retreating some friendly hand to plies her through the long line of those glittering rooms.

CHAPTER VII.

LADY DIANA.

SHE was a coquette from the glossy crown of her warm-colored hair to the tips of her pretty feet. Natural coquetry is as instinctive to her as walking sideways does to a crab, singing to a lark, or the love of tormenting to a school-boy. She could no more resist the impulse to conquer than she could refrain from satisfying hunger or thirst when they came. She was a widow, and she believed that her husband had died without finding her out, and the memory of his obtuseness was the unmitigated satisfaction to Lady Diana, for she had a kind heart, which was frequently a prey to remorse and tormented by keen regrets.

It was the power of feeling so much of what she feigned that made her doubly dangerous.

She loved with enough passion to make fire in men's hearts, and when she found the flames she had kindled becoming dangerous in their unruly keenness, she retired from the conflagration with infinite tact and grace.

It is a wonder that she had not grown tired of her play, and wearied of the cold reception of the same thing; but does the keen sportsman ever fail to bear his heart throb, his blood rush, when the gallops up and in the track of the hounds? Does not a cat, even when she is sick and well-fed, pounce on the mouse she is not going to eat? So devoted, panting is the deadly, watching its frantic gyrations with blazing eye and curved claw, enjoying its terror, and mainly finishing the matter with a decisive crunch?

Lady Diana, too, was a victim to her passion for sport—a victim, for have I not said that she suffered at least half of what she inflicted? Notwithstanding that she knew her pleasure was one with bestowing her soul, squandered her reputation, and degraded her womanhood—notwithstanding that she repented much, was often unfortunately in love, more often inconveniently beloved—notwithstanding that she was now thirty-five, and no longer prized her sport for twenty years—she still watched with interest for the first careless look of admiration from a stranger's eyes, who happened to be the privileged glance which spoke of a deeper sentiment. She knew how to interpret every symptom of her increasing influence. She liked to see the bright face grow pensive, an easy manner constrained, a prompt tongue incoherent and clumsy of speech. She liked to watch the hesitation, approach to the wound she had dealt creep through a man's system until it culminated in delirium, until love chased in the eyes, and choked his breath, wrenching like a torrent over every obstacle that strove to stem its fatal sway. Her eyes looked innocent enough for her to know, and her face herself did not think that their sweet, gray lights would ever shine in the world of pure spirits. She knew that she was wicked. She thought she would be very likely punished in a future state for her moral obliquity in this, but still she did not change her ways. I am not quite certain that by this time it would have been possible for her to change them. She was "fooling to the strong pillars she, Samson-like, delighted to hurl from their high estate?

It was long past midnight when Lady Diana returned home from Lord Orme's ball.

She unloosed her hair until it tumbled in rich warm masses over her shoulders, unfastened the glittering ornaments which were adorned by her beauty (I am not quite sure that the natural living loveliness of a beautiful woman is adorned by the hard glitter of unpliable gems), and putting them and her slender bracelet and watch over her, enveloped herself in the soft folds of a cashmere dressing-gown, kicked off her little boots, dived her round white arms on the table until they found and took refuge in padded depths of her slippers, settled herself in her chair, and betook herself to perusing her letters and sipping her chocolate.

Once she found her eyes resting on a miniature portrait of her late husband. Stuart Mervale's wife grew ashamed of her widow in a bland unconsciousness of her proceedings as the original had apparently been during life.

"Poor Stuart!" sighed Lady Diana; "he had his use; he put a certain limit to unreasonable demands." She sighed again as she looked down at a letter she twirled between her fingers, a thick double sheet, covered with great black scrawls—a letter in which the pen was speeded by the passionate haste of the writer's heart—the characters blurred by laying incoherence.

"Marry! of course I can't marry. Smothered with debts as I am, how can I marry a poor man? But I must put an end to this at once—it is only honorable not to keep him in suspense." (Lady Diana actually had a code of honor in these matters.) With the pen in her chair and writing for three or four pages with rapid fluency, although, as she said in the commencement of her letter, she "hardly knew how to fashion words that nearly broke her heart to write!"

Her face expressed real emotion at that portion of her letter where she prayed forgiveness for all the bitter pain she had caused him whom she addressed. She was sincere in this prayer. She would have liked human hearts to accept and acknowledge compensation for injuries done them with the same benignity with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer receives the penitence of recusant tax-payers.

"That's done," she said, with a sigh of relief as she sealed her missive; then she finished her chocolate and sauntered to the window which faced the street. Was it by accident or design that she clasped her hands above her head in a languorous movement which sent floatest her sunny brown hair in tumbled masses to her waist?

"My face is rather faded," was Lady Diana's candid reflection as she stole a glance from between her hands, as she looked in the mirror, "but no one can deny that my figure is lovely."

It is to be supposed that so accomplished an actress was aware of the fact that a blaze of evening sun, or a heaving mass of waters. Standing near the wall that skirted the opposite cliff was the form of a man. As if

JOHN G. WHITTIER.

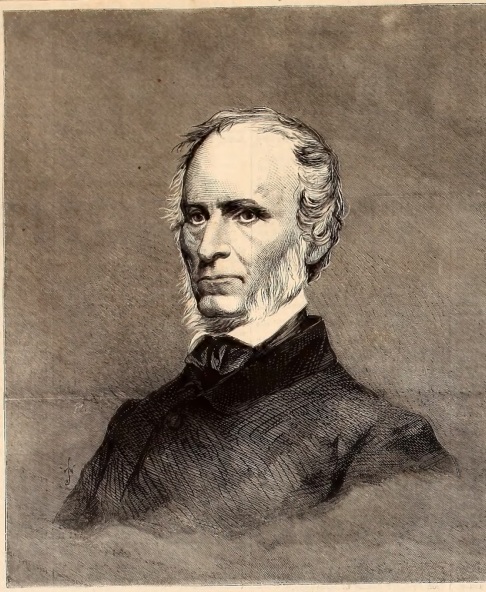
IN a secluded vale on the eastern border of Haverhill, Massachusetts, not far from the line of West Amesbury, nestles an old brown farmhouse, which has been made famous by the New England idyl, "Snow-Bound." In this rural home JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER, one of the three leading American poets, was born in December, 1808. His parents were of the Society of Friends, and young WHITTIER was strictly brought up in the tenets of that denomination. To-day the followers of GEORGE FOX have not a more consistent fellow-member, albeit large-minded and broad in his Christian sympathies, than the "Quaker poet." He belongs to that branch of the Friends denominated "Orthodox."

The boy WHITTIER, passing his early years amidst the picturesqueness of his New England home, seems to have been very deeply impressed by the scenes of nature around him. In his "Barefoot Boy," the "Last Walk in Autumn," the lines on "Burns," and "Snow-Bound," we have glimpses of his personal history so vivid that we can not doubt that he "lives in them his boyhood o'er again."

Not a hundred yards from the doorway young WHITTIER heard the music of that clear brook that still goes dashing over its pebbly bed to the sand-rimmed pickerel-pond, "where the whitest lilies blow." The elms around the house were peopled with the homes of swinging orioles. The woods where the boy wandered, the ferny dells, the hedges, and meadows, out of which came the odor of wild flowers, "and clover bloom and sweet-brier smell," all existed, as he tells us, for one whom, in that "boyhood's time of June," nature answered all he asked. He speaks most charmingly of these glorious days when all the world seemed fashioned for him:

"Whom all things I heard or saw,
Me, their master, waited for.
I was rich in flowers and trees,
Humming-birds and honey-bees.
Laughed the brook for my delight
Through the day and through the night,
Whispering at the garden wall,
Talked with me from fall to fall;
Mine, the sand-rimmed pickerel-pond,
Mine, the walnut slopes beyond,
Mine, on bending orchard trees
Apples of Hesperides!"

His horizon was not, however, limited to the view from the dooryard of his home. New scenes, and of wide extent, met the early gaze of WHITTIER. To-day, if we climb the hill behind the old farm-house and look eastward, we shall see the broad blue Atlantic rolling its waves along a picturesque shore, save where the silver Merrimac cleaves its way to the ocean between the white sands of Salisbury and Plumb Island. Turning to the northwest the hills of New Hampshire (the Kettingham and Deerfield mountains) are near at hand, while, on a clear day, the Grand Monadnock, the azure peak of Kearsarge, and the dim outline of the Green Mountains, seem as if we were having glimpses of distant Alp-land. Living amidst such scenery, and having a mother of poetic temperament, as is evident from the description of her in "Snow-Bound," we can easily see how a lad of ardent imagination could very early become steeped in the sentiment of poesy.



JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER.

The round of common duties on his father's farm was varied by the winter's school, by reading, and, as he grew space, by two years at the "Academy." He read every thing he could lay his hands upon. The delight and avidity with which he read his first copy of Burns (which poet, by-the-way, he resembles in his hearty independence and keen observance of nature) are beautifully depicted in a poem, oft repeated in the English and American press, entitled, "Burns: On Receiving a Sprig of Heather in Blossom."

At eighteen he taught the Common School in West Amesbury. When he was twenty-one he became the editor of a journal in Boston, whose aim was protection to American industry. In 1830 he went to Hartford, Connecticut, and edited the New England Weekly Review, which was once edited by the Connecticut poet, JOHN G. C. BRAINARD, for whose "Remains" WHITTIER wrote the memoir in 1832. WHITTIER'S immediate predecessor in the Hartford editorial chair was GEORGE D. PRENTICE, of the Louisville Journal. It is curious to note the fact that BRYANT'S earliest published poem (when BRYANT was only thirteen) was a political composition entitled "The Embargo," and that the poet henceforth eschewed politics, as such, in verse, but has been for more than thirty years a vigorous anti-tariff prose-writer, and a stanch defender of the rights of man; while WHITTIER'S earliest printed efforts were arguments in prose in behalf of a tariff, the advocacy of which he has not addressed himself to for many years, but in verse he has done vigorous political battle against social wrong, and in favor of the Republican party, from the time it clearly stood on the platform of anti-slavery. His prose compositions have been more considerable and more widely circulated than is generally supposed. In 1831 appeared his "Legends of New England," and afterward that charming work, in the style of "Lady Willoughby's Diary," "Leaves from Margaret Smith's Journal," a story of 1678. In 1850 he published a volume of essays on BUNYAN, BAXTER, ELLWOOD, ANDREW MARVELL, LAUGHTT, and others, under the title of "Old Portraits and Modern Sketches."

THE NECESSITY OF THE PERIOD—"EIGHT-HOUR MEN."

"NOW, therefore, I, ULYSSES S. GRANT, President of the United States, do hereby direct that from and after this date no reduction shall be made in the wages paid by the Government by the day to such laborers, workmen, and mechanics, on account of such reduction of the hours of labor" TO EIGHT HOURS A DAY.

As early as 1836 he had published "Mogg Megone," a spirited poem of considerable length, in which he depicts the scenery of Maine, and paints the Indian, not in the false and romantic colors of COOPER, and some other writers both of prose and verse, but as the brute, wild redman of the forest really is. "The Bridal of Pennecook" appeared at a later period, and contains some of WHITTIER'S most vivid descriptions of nature. In 1836 he became the very active Secretary of the American Anti-Slavery Society, and also edited the Pennsylvania Freeman in Philadelphia. He fought, either in prose or verse, with zeal and courage, coupled with common-sense, for the slave, until no unpaid menial could be found on the broad surface of his country.

In 1840, the old farm having been sold, he took up his residence at Amesbury, in which large manufacturing town his influence for good has been felt in the promotion of education, agriculture, and social morality. He has represented Amesbury several times in the Massachusetts Legislature, but other proposed civic honors—as the unanimous nomination of his party for Congress—have always been promptly declined. For several years he was corresponding editor of the National Era, of Washington, the journal in which MRS. STOWE'S "Uncle Tom's Cabin" originally appeared. From 1843 up to the present date his muse has been prolific; and while he has written much to effect a temporary purpose, yet during these years he has produced much that will be an enduring monument to his name, as "Maud Muller," "the Last Walk in Autumn," "Snow-Bound," and "Among the Hills." His controversial writings, in prose and verse, on the subject of slavery, are thus described by a most competent critic, Mr. GEORGE S. HILLIARD, of Boston: "His writings are characterized by earnestness of tone, high moral purpose, and energy of expression. His spirit is that of a sincere and fearless reformer, and his fervent appeals are the true utterances of a brave and loving heart."

A man's lasting fame may be predicated when, first, he wins his way both to the popular heart and to the necessarily limited number of the cul-

GREEN GRASS.

BECAUSE it is of such importance in the economy of the earth's surface grass is universally spread over the face of all countries, and in all climates where air-breathing animals exist. Its functions are extremely interesting, and certainly very remarkable. Grass acts first on inorganic matter held in solution in water, which its roots suck up at their extremities and combine with essential elements extracted from the atmosphere. It then has elaborated the grain becomes nourishing food for herbivorous animals. Without it they could not live at all. In their digestive apparatus is constructed with reference to appropriating food thus originally prepared in grass for their growth and health. Carnivorous animals could not feed on vegetable food, but as soon as that has been assimilated by being eaten, then they feed on the flesh of those that fed on grass. Lastly, man, being omnivorous, has the necessary mechanical organs for digesting either vegetable or animal food, separately or combined. Grass, therefore, begins the process of furnishing food for the cattle on the thousand hills; men eat the beef; and so all flesh is ultimately grass, according to the Bible. Destroy the grass, and the great magazine of universal food would fail, and all animal life would cease by starvation.

ELEPHANTS.

FOR ages mankind have been familiar with the general appearance of the elephant, the largest animal on the globe; but travelers and naturalists are very frequently discovering new facts in regard to their habits, intelligence, and sagacity, which give new interest to the character of that monster. It is now settled that there are several distinct species. Those in equatorial Africa are vastly larger than the variety with which Europeans are most acquainted in the East Indies. The first have immensely large ivory tusks ears, which when thrown back cover the whole of the shoulders, and thus serve an important purpose in warning and keeping off annoying insects. The others have comparatively small ears, less serviceable as protecting instruments. The African elephant rarely has the two tusks of the same size or length. Ranging about in herds, they attain in surprisingly quick time power for the sake of the tender leaves they know are only at the top. While some pry and lift with the right tusk under or among the branches, others seize the trunk and thus heave it over. They are right handed, like all quadrupeds, as well as human. The right tusk is consequently the one most used, most is not only stouter and larger than the left, but often broken off at the point from unusual wearing in their foraging operations. Formerly, when large numbers of elephants were trained for war in the neighborhood of Calcutta, a large rows of tusks were broken off, and the chains thirty feet long fastened to a collar, at word of command would suddenly wind them around their trunks and bring them down and out horizontally with prodigious force, sweeping down whole platoons of soldiers at once when in close engagement.

The Celebrated Imitation Gold $15. HUNTING WATCHES, $20.

THE COLLINS GOLD WATCH FACTORY.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Our agents worldwide Watches having recently been imitated, and worthless watches sold in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities, represented as our Watches, we deem it our duty to caution the public against them, and give notice that we are in no way responsible for these bogus concerns, and only those purchasing directly from us can secure a genuine Watch of our manufacture. We have recently greatly improved our Cases in appearance and durability; also, to protect the public from imposition hereafter, we have named it the

"COLLINS METAL,"

and we give notice that any one making use of this name will be prosecuted to the extent of the law.

This metal has all the brilliancy and durability of Gold; can not be distinguished from it by the best judges; retains its color till worn out, and is equal to gold excepting in intrinsic value. All our Gentlemen's Watches are Full-Jewelled Patent Levers; those for Ladies in improved Escapements, better than a Lever for a small Watch; all in Hunting-Cases, and fully guaranteed by special certificate. The $15 Watches are equal in beauty and durability to the $20 Watches, and for time, to a $50 Gold Watch. These for $99 one of a rare fine finish, and are fully equal to a Gold Watch costing $200. Chains of every style, from $2 to $6.

A FULL LINE.—We are manufacturing all kinds of Jewelry of the Collins Metal—Pins, Earrings, Sleeve-Buttons, Lockets, Studs, Finger-Rings, Bracelets, Pencils, Charms, Odd Fellow and Masonic Pins, &c., all of the finest and most elaborate designs, and fully equal to gold in appearance and durability.

TO CLUBS:—Where Six Watches are ordered at one time, we will send one extra Watch free of charge. We positively employ no agents (who would require a commission), so we can not possibly manufacture the watches for less than our published prices. Our regular customers, therefore, have the benefit of our lowest prices. Parties in New York or elsewhere representing themselves as our agents are swindlers. The genuine Collins Watches can only be had at our office in New York City. Customers are requested not to send money to strangers, but to remit by Express, which will be forwarded to us paid for when taken from the express office. Customers must pay all express charges. In ordering, write plainly the name, town, county, and state. Letters and packages in the city will be delivered at our office.

NEW AMERICAN FARM-BOOK.

Originally by Richard L. Allen. Revised and greatly enlarged by Lewis F. Allen. Price $2 50.

Allen's American Farm-Book has been one of the standard farmers' hand-books for twenty years. It is still a valuable book, but not up to the times; and as its author, Mr. R. L. Allen, could not give time to its revision, this was undertaken by his brother, Hon. Lewis F. Allen, the distinguished farmer of Niagara County, Editor of the American Shorthorn Herd Book. The work is greatly enlarged, and full of suggestions from the rich experience of its editor and reviser, and is called the New American Farm-Book.

THE PRACTICAL POULTRY KEEPER.

A Complete and Standard Guide to the Management of Poultry, whether for Domestic Use, the Markets, or Exhibition. Illustrated with twelve full-page plates, and numerous smaller cuts. By D. Wright. Price $2 00.

The design of the author of this work was to prepare instructions that could be put into the hands of a person inexperienced in poultry keeping, with the reasonable certainty that these instructions, if followed, would command success. The volume is the fruit of a thorough practical experience and knowledge of fowls, and it is believed that it will be found a plain and sufficient guide to the young poultry keeper in any circumstances that are likely to occur to him; while experienced breeders will also find hints which will be useful to them. Special attention has been paid to practical management, and the different breeds have been investigated: of every leading variety all essential description has been given to answer every purpose of the fancier.

PARSONS ON THE ROSE.

A Treatise on the Propagation, Culture, and History of the Rose. Revised and newly electrotyped. Illustrated. By Samuel B. Parsons. Price $1 50.

The Rose is the only flower that can be said to have a history. It is popular now, and was so centuries ago. In his work upon the Rose, Mr. Parsons has gathered up the curious legends concerning the flower, and gives us an idea of the esteem in which it was held in former times. A simple garden classification has been adopted, and the leading varieties under each class enumerated and briefly described. The chapters on multiplication, cultivation, &c. training are very full, and the work is altogether the most complete of any before the public.

FARM IMPLEMENTS AND MACHINERY.

The principles of their construction and use; with simple and practical explanations of the laws of motion and force as applied on the farm. By John J. Thomas. With 287 Illustrations. Price $1 50.

The basis of this admirable work was an essay published in 1850, by the transactions of the N. Y. State Agricultural Society, which was enlarged, and in 1854 published by the Harpers. It has been, and remains, the only work in which the principles of Natural Philosophy, namely, the mechanical powers and the powers of water, wind, and heat, are systematically discussed as applied to the operations of the farm. This work has now been most carefully revised by the author. It is much enlarged, and a great part has been re-written, while the illustrations, before abundant, have become two hundred and sixty-seven. There is not an agricultural writer that could be named more respected than John J. Thomas, or one whose judgment and freedom from personal bias in discussing new implements could be more implicitly relied upon.

PRACTICAL FLORICULTURE.

A guide to the successful propagation and cultivation of Florists' Plants. By Peter Henderson, author of "Gardening for Profit." Beautifully illustrated. Price $1 50.

Really the most practical and desirable work that has ever been published on this subject. We are selling them rapidly, and have no doubt we will say that it exposes the "secrets" of the Trade too freely, and that it will injure the business of florists engaged in that our occupation, like Othello's, will be gone.—H. A. Terry, Seedsman and Florist, Pala, Pa.

Full to overflowing with valuable information.—Canada Farmer, Montgomery, Canada.

Thoroughly practical, yet readable as a novel.—Sun.

Just the work for the young Florist or Amateur, as it tells him clearly there is no such thing as failure, if a few simple directions be followed.

THE BOSTON PEACE JUBILEE.

A FEW weeks ago we gave an illustration of the grand Coliseum in which the Boston Peace Jubilee is held. The building, which was then only partially constructed, is now complete, and we give on page 389 a more perfect representation. MR. P. S. GILMORE, whose portrait we publish on this page, was the originator of this jubilee. He has shown wonderful tact and skill in the preparation of his programme, as well as in organizing and bringing thus far toward completion the grandest musical enterprise the world has ever witnessed. He has provided music which will meet with the approbation of every taste—the popular as well as the classical.

The building has been pronounced safe by competent engineers, and arrangements have been made in the event of a fire breaking out.

The immense chorus is to consist of 10,000 voices, accompanied by an orchestra of 1000 instruments.

This tremendous affair has weighed so heavily upon the brains of our clever artist, MR. BUSH, that he has only been able to find relief in a double-page cartoon, which we publish in this Number. The cartoon tells its own story, and we shall make no comments.

P. S. GILMORE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY G. H. LOOMIS, BOSTON.]

DECORATION EXERCISES AT CYPRESS HILLS CEMETERY.

THE day appointed for the decoration of the graves of Union soldiers (May 30) was universally observed. We give on this page an illustration of the decoration at Cypress Hills Cemetery, Brooklyn, New York. The procession started from Union Square in this city about noon. The First Division was headed by Major-General ALEXANDER SHALER and his staff, mounted, which comprised four companies of United States Marines, accompanied by their famous band, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel BROOME; a squad of the Washington Gray Troop, commanded by Major KENT, and a troop of the Third Cavalry. Following in the rear of the division was General VARIAN and General BURGER, accompanied by several officers of their staffs. In the Second Division, seated in carriages, were the officers of the Memorial Executive Committee, and the orators of the day, Major-General DANIEL E. SICKLES and Grand Commander Colonel EDWARD B. LANSING. The catafalque used at the obsequies of President LINCOLN, decorated with flowers in monumental form, was drawn by eight white horses furnished by Dodd's Express Company. Seventy-five boys of the Union Home and School, orphans of deceased Union soldiers, were in uniform, under the command of one of their own number. Fifty girls from the same school were in three of the large Erie Railroad express wagons, which were handsomely decorated with flags and bunting. One of the wagons was drawn by ten black horses. There were also two wagons filled with flowers.

For a long time before the head of the procession reached the portals of the cemetery the grounds were alive with people. Many had brought carriage-loads of flowers with them to decorate the graves. Many who had come afoot brought their modest floral offerings too, and more than one narrow grave was beautifully decked long before the hour for the ceremonies had arrived.

When the different organizations composing the procession had been properly disposed about the mound overlooking the soldiers' graves, the services were opened by the singing of a hymn. After which a prayer was offered by the chaplain of the G. A. R., and a beautiful hymn sung by the soldiers' orphans from the Union Home at Carmansville.

General SICKLES then advanced and addressed the assemblage. He said: "We stand where more than 3000 soldiers of the Republic are buried. We come to scatter upon their graves the mute but eloquent tributes of our gratitude and affection. We bring with us the standards under which many of them fell—and here, too, are many of their children, whom it is our duty to care for and to cherish. Soldiers are here, merchants, men of all walks in life, all united to-day in asserting their sympathy for the object which has called us together. Our Memorial-day is of special interest to us, whose comrades be buried here. We mourn the loss of friends who have fought side by side with us, our tears below the former we lay upon their quiet graves, but our grief is mingled with the pride we feel when we think of the noble services of those who did not die in vain when struggling to aid in the salvation of our country. The magistrate who enforces the laws, who wields the sword of justice to the end that the welfare of society may be preserved, is a benefactor; but the men who fill these graves are greater benefactors by far. They fought that the law might be observed. They gave up home and life for country, and we enjoy to-day the fruits of their exertions, and may we ever hold them in grateful remembrance."

General SICKLES closed with an eloquent appeal in behalf of the soldiers' orphans, claiming that there can be no more grateful or grateful service than to care for these children of the Republic, whose fathers died that the Republic might live.

The following is the hymn sung at the opening of the exercises:

Love nothing else for the dead,
Lying here in gloried sleep,
Where the angels softly tread,
While their holy watch they keep.

Wreathe we bring that ne'er shall fade,
Greens for the passing years,
Brighter for our sorrow's shade,
Jewels for our fallen tears.

Dying that the truth might live,
Here lies each in Freedom's name,
Giving all that man can give—
Life for life's deathless fame.

Bend in love, O nature sky!
Shine, O stars! at evening-time!
Watch where heroes calmly lie,
Clothed with faith and hope sublime.

God of nations, bless the land
You have rested to make free!
Guide us with thy mighty hand,
Till all lands shall come to Thee!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, JUNE 19, 1869.

THE CONDITION OF THE ENGLISH QUESTION.

IT is a pleasant duty to record a much better feeling in regard to the English difficulty. Indeed, it would be preposterous that a Republican administration in this country, and an English ministry of which JOHN BRIGHT is a member, should come to loggerheads upon a question arising out of the war. Shall we add that it is fortunate also that Parliament has not taken up the matter, and that Congress is not in session? because in the warmth of debate it is very easy to say what it is not very easy to forget, and what wounds and rankles in a degree quite disproportioned to the real weight of the words.

Mr. MOTLEY'S friendly little speeches in Liverpool, and the conciliatory comments upon them of the London journals; the speech of Mr. W. E. FORSTER, one of our most faithful friends during the rebellion; and the letter of Mr. LESLIE STEPHEN, also among our friends, to the Pall Mall Gazette, are the most important contributions to the debate in England as we write, with the DUKE OF SOMERSET'S declarations showing that Governor MARCY of New York recognized the Canadian rebels as belligerents in 1837, and that he was virtually supported by the National Government.

Upon our side the publication of extracts from the diplomatic correspondence showing that at the time of the proclamation of neutrality by the European powers the United States Government was satisfied and so expressed itself; the speech of General BUTLER at the graves of the Union soldiers in Georgetown which inculcated undying hatred to England; the articles in the newspapers which are of a softened tone; a reported conversation in which Mr. SUMNER in which the Senator is represented as saying that the fluttering in England is a sign of coming peace, and that JOHN BRIGHT has about done his work, are the noticeable events.

We hope that Mr. SUMNER is misrepresented. The report places him in a very unpleasant position toward Mr. BRIGHT, and apparently upon no other ground than a report by telegraph of something Mr. BRIGHT is said to have said in an informal conversation at a public meeting. We have not supposed that the members of the British Cabinet were in the habit of reporting remarks of any kind that may be made within the official circle, and something more than a story by telegraph is necessary to change that belief. The "interviewer" also reports Senator SUMNER as differing with the President upon the course which the United States should adopt. The Senator, he says, is in favor of opening negotiations upon the new basis of his speech, and would have instructed Mr. MOTLEY accordingly. The President prefers to leave the matter without positive directions, and to follow the lead of circumstances.

General BUTLER has also been "seen" by a reporter, and says that we have no case against England upon the grounds alleged by Senator SUMNER, but only upon the general ground of her desire to break down our government: that we had better do nothing but wait until a fitting opportunity, and then, as England was a robber, we can be as assassin by way of keeping the balance of morality. There is a tendency to this view in many other minds, and in some newspapers, and we consider it elsewhere. The General's speech at Georgetown was an exhortation that the Union soldiers, although dead, will yet serve their country by keeping alive in the hearts of the people the remembrance of the injuries inflicted by England. A more unpardonable insult to the character and memory of the Massachusetts boys, in professed honor of whom he spoke, is not conceivable.

The speech of Mr. WILLIAM E. FORSTER in a reply to that of Senator SUMNER is, and presents the English view in a conciliatory and clear. It is indeed the best speech by Mr. FORSTER that we have seen. He defends the issuing of the neutrality proclamation, and says that although the European Governments were awaiting the arrival of Mr. ADAMS, yet that many of the most ardent friends of the United States were anxious that neutrality should be proclaimed, and that he himself was among the number. Mr. FORSTER questions the soundness of Senator SUMNER'S claim in this case of a distinction between belligerents and rebels, and because the blockade was an act of war, and of necessity implied maritime opportunities and rights. He denies that England is flung from the wave the scale of Slavery. Certain classes in England undoubtedly did so; but the friends of America in England, whom Mr. FORSTER thinks that Mr. SUMNER is inclined to forget, "kept the Government" straight, and prevented it from throwing its force for Slavery. Moreover, Mr. SUMNER, as Mr. FORSTER said, in the course charges half of the cost of the war to England, because that if England had accepted the invitation of France to recognize the Confederacy, the cost of the struggle to us—for he does not think that we should have won—would have been quintupled. To refuse to take such a step was certainly, he says, not to show unfriendliness.

But Mr. FORSTER, and no other honorable Englishman, so far as we know, defends the Alabama escape. "There was great mistake," he says, "of the Alabama." Englishmen are willing to submit to arbitration, and to pay damages if the arbitrator—as I dare say he would—decides against us." The tone of Mr. FORSTER'S speech is very manly and conciliatory, and his conclusions are doubtless those of the Englishmen who are and always have been friendly. Indeed, we may say at once that the question of feeling is one that can not be settled by any other arbitration than that of war. The American mind is probably decided upon that subject, and the American people and the British Government under the laws of nations is a question for investigation, and with it the damages for the escape of the Alabama. The impression of regret for the escape of the Alabama would, under the circumstances, probably be proffered, and the damages willingly paid. But no one will for one moment doubt that we have our opinion that a general apology and moral damages would not be made or offered by the United States were the case reversed.

COURTESY AND CONFUSION.

THE country has hardly sufficiently considered the responsibility of the Senate for the complication arising from the unfortunate performances of Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON in England. As we remarked last week, the Senate is known to foreign governments as the treatymaking power; and it is of course assumed that a Minister who, with the view of a certain negotiation, is unanimously approved by the Senate, represents its views upon that negotiation. Indeed any other assumption would be ridiculous. When, therefore, Mr. JOHNSON arrived in England, and it was known that he was not only unanimously confirmed by the Senate but that he was himself a Senator at the time of his appointment, there could be but one impression, and that was that he was peculiarly the representative of the Senate's opinion. The British Government was under a misapprehension for which the Senate was responsible.

Indeed, so strongly did we feel at the time that Mr. JOHNSON was not a representative of the opinion and spirit of the country with which England had to deal that we said so with some emphasis, and were censured for doing so. But we did not directly censure, as we should have done, the action of the Senate in confirming him. There was no doubt of Mr. JOHNSON'S general ability, as it is called, nor could there be any doubt that he was in sympathy with the Senate in its political views; but because he was a Senator, and because there is some kind of courtesy, so called, which compels the Senate to confirm the nomination of one of its own members, there was no protest; it was considered fortunate that President JOHNSON had made such a nomination, and Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON was confirmed. Yet if he had been a candidate for the Presidency, and had been defeated, the President he would direct the Alabama negotiations, or was the Republican Senator would have voted for him. By confirming him as Minister to England, the Senators placed him and themselves and their country and England in a false position, and are really responsible for a great deal of the present situation.

If the Senate had refused to fill the English mission until it was really satisfied with the nomination, it would have done its duty. It did not hesitate to reject General M'CLELLAN when he was put before the Senate to overthrow one of General M'CLELLAN'S most strenuous supporters, and the one whom, had he been elected President, General M'CLELLAN would probably have made Secretary of State. This was done, as we say, as an act of courtesy. But is it not now tolerably evident that such a reason should no longer be allowed to complicate public affairs, and even, possibly, to imperil the peaceful relations of the country? If President JOHNSON should nominate Senator SUMNER as Minister to England or to any other country, or to any office of responsibility, would the Senate have felt compelled by courtesy to confirm the nomination? But if the reasons which would probably have prevailed in his case were sufficient to secure his rejection, certainly those of another, which existed in the case of Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON, were equally sufficient. We trust that this kind of courtesy will not hereafter procure important confirmations.

THE REPUBLIC OF CUBA.

THE recent news from Cuba is favorable to the revolutionists. It is mainly of progress and intention rather than of performance. General CESPEDES has sent to the Minister of the Republic of Cuba in the United States, Mr. LEMUS, a statement that fourteen representatives, elected in the insurrectionary districts by universal suffrage, met as a Congress in Guimaro on the 10th of April. This Congress adopted a Constitution based upon the recognition of the equal rights of all men. It divides the three powers—legislative, executive, and judicial—into distinct departments, and the island into four States, each to be equally represented in a House of Representatives, in which resides the legislative power, and which is elected by all citizens over twenty years of age. The executive power is lodged in a President elected by the House of Representatives and responsible to it. There is also elected a General-in-Chief. The President names four Secretaries of Departments with the approval of the House. There will be a Supreme Court, the Judiciary Department by-and-by; and meanwhile the right of petition, freedom of worship, liberty of speech and of the press, are declared inalienable rights.

On the 11th of April the Congress met again, and unanimously elected CESPEDES President of the Republic and General QUESADA Commander-in-Chief of the forces. The Secretaries were nominated and approved, and entered upon their duties. A national flag, the same that was unfurled by AGUERO, was also adopted. This frame of government the revolutionary leaders had already declared to be temporary and provisional only, as they have declared for annexation to the United States. There are no facts given, except that the election of the fourteen members, but they are undoubtedly accepted as representatives by the revolutionists, who are probably the great body of the native Cubans. Meanwhile friendly expeditions have landed upon the island with men and arms. General DULCE is going home to Spain, and General CALLEJA, of Key West, is coming in his place. This appointment is a mistake upon the part of the Provisional Government of Spain, for DULCE is known, chiefly by his bloody suppression of a Republican movement in Malagas and other cities last year.

There is, however, the old want of accurate information of facts. Rumors of engagements, of captures, etc., resound in the correspondence, but as yet there are no authentic accounts. Delay is favorable to the revolution. Spain certainly can not spare more troops, and those on the island are apparently unable to subdue the spirit and endurance of the Cubans. The civil government is as yet very shadowy; but the undeniable fact is that the revolution began last October, and is, so far as can be seen, as vigorous as ever.

LEX TALIONIS.

PROBABLY no intelligent man doubts that England will pay for the losses by the Alabama, and pay by her own consent. But during the discussion, and indeed ever since that ship, which we must insist was by her practices at sea a mere pirate, sailed gayly away from Liverpool, it has been darkly reiterated with a grim smile: "We are in no hurry: when England goes to war again or falls into trouble, we can then see how she likes her own pills." This feeling was recently expressed by General BUTLER, as we have elsewhere mentioned, in an "interview" which has been duly reported. The General, according to the report, said: "Now as to the remedy. We need not go to war. We can afford to wait. England took her chance to cripple us when we were in trouble. We can wait till some fitting opportunity enables us to repay her in kind. We can easily find means, whenever she gets into a war, to sweep her commerce from the ocean, and substitute our own in its place. We can afford to wait."

Certainly we can afford to wait, but we can't afford to be rascals. We can afford to pay the Alabama claims out of our own pockets, but we can't afford to steal. We can afford to do any thing honorable and just, but we can not afford to do what we have denounced as villainy and immorality. For eight years we have steadily declared that the conduct of England was indefensible; that it was both an offense against humanity and against international law; that it was the end of harmony among nations; and that if other countries should follow it we saw an example every war that began would involve the whole world in hostilities. We have, moreover, with just pride pointed to our own precedents. We have always declared that the proof of our international obligation was without a spot; and when we surrendered the rebel emissaries captured upon the Trent we did so in express obedience to our own precedents, and not to the demand of Great Britain. And now because, as is alleged, England has behaved like a barbarian, we will throw our civilization, our history, our honor to the winds, and servilely imitate an example that we despise!

A savage who has those cities have been scalped and disemboweled may execute vengeance upon an enemy in kind; but how are we ever to emerge from the savage state if we do not even try to be civilized? Could we, for example, the Spanish General in Cuba, issues a proclamation denouncing fire and slaughter against the enemy as ordered by BEAUREGARD in "Booty and Beauty" order during the rebellion.

honest man feels that if the Spaniards resort to such a policy they deserve defeat, whatever their plea. But when it is known that the Spaniards has done the same thing, whether in retaliation or not, the revolution instantly loses the immense aid of the indignation and sympathy which VALMASEDA had aroused. Retaliation is the warfare of savages, but not of civilized nations. The best public opinion would not sanction the scalping and burning of Indians because they might have scalped and burned our soldiers whom they had captured; nor ought we to eat the prisoners whom we might make among a cannibal enemy because the cannibals would eat us.

It was our pride, when Canada calmly saw the rebel cruiser Florida and other piratical vessels of Vermont villages, instantly to send a military force to prevent the Fenian raids from the United States. And if there is to be any progressive civilization, if the ravages of war are to be diminished and the peace of the world to be promoted, it is to be done by insisting upon the highest law not by yielding to it and to condemn as the lowest rule of international conduct. International law, as it is improperly called, is, indeed, substantially the law of might. A strong maritime nation does what it will, makes a precedent and calls it law. But the true fraternity of nations can be promoted only by that appeal to the common conscience and good sense which lies in clinging fast to the justice and honor which that conscience recognizes. It would certainly be rather mortifying if we should ourselves have to descend to all the reproaches that we have heaped upon England during the eight years just past.

NATIONAL FINANCES.

IT is contended in support of Mr. BOUTWELL'S policy of purchasing the Five-Twenties under date of Three per cent. certificates thus the Act of February 25, 1862, authorizing a Sinking Fund, and the Act of January 25, 1868, forbidding any curtailment of the currency, are in their joint effect imperative in requiring that the duty shall not only be performed, but in that manner.

There is undoubtedly much force in this ground. The purchase or payment "of one per centum of the entire debt" was to be made "in each fiscal year after the first of July, 1862;" but the late Secretary of the Treasury failed to obtain and set apart any portion of the debt as a Sinking Fund, and Congress made no provision of the question.

The Act above referred to of January 25, 1868, which prevents any "reduction of the currency by retiring or canceling United States notes," does not apply to any other legal tender per cent. certificates, as they are not strictly notes; and hence, if a rigid interpretation were followed, those certificates might be obtained and set apart for the purposes of the fund.

Mr. M'CULLOCH had other reasons for omitting all compliance with the Act than the existence of the power to prevent contraction, for he would neither set apart the Three per cent. certificates nor the Five-Twenties. What reason governed him? There is some ground for the pretense that the Sinking Fund Act vests some discretion in the Secretary of the Treasury as to whether or not one per centum of the debt shall be obtained and applied in that manner; but the words, "as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct," contained in the second subdivision of the fifth section, apply only to the investment of the satenest earned by the fund as to which discretion may be used. No discretion on the other point is allowed.

That Mr. M'CULLOCH had a surplus of gold, and that it was sold for the purpose of obtaining currency to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government, is well known. The necessity for this was unquestionably due to the failure to take the necessary means for collecting the Internal Revenue, and particularly from whisky —an omission which was allowed to gratify the personal ambition of the late President, whose adherents consisted principally of the Whisky Ring, and of those who derived profit from the irregular action of the Government. The calamity to the United States of being obliged to pass through nearly four years of maladministration is now over; but although the influence of it will be felt through years, the Government is still able to perform its guarantees to its creditors.

On looking at the terms of the numerous acts passed during the war it will appear that our resources obtained from duties were to be applied to the interest of the debt, and the residue to the creation of the Sinking Fund; and that those resources which are derived from Internal Revenues were to be applied to the ordinary expenses of the Government, and to the purchase of gold for the purpose of payment of interest. The creditors of the United States, holding the debt created under the act of February 25, 1862, and subsequently, have an undoubted right to call for the application to the Sinking Fund of such proportion of the Customs receipts as the Act of February, 1862, specifies. The public faith is pledged to this, as the creation of the fund constituted one of the inducements for taking the bonds.

The first question to be determined in considering the question is, whether any surplus of gold over and above what will be required to pay the interest for the fiscal year actually exists. Mr. BOUTWELL has been in office only three months, during which time no considerable part of the present accumulation of gold could have arisen. All of the revenue from imports continues on the scale of present receipts; it may fairly be assumed that at least the one per cent. of the debt (say $26,000,000) which the Act authorizes to be set apart in each year will safely be done, but a diminution of these receipts is not improbable—a fact which should be carefully weighed.

In constituting the fund, the question whether to use the Five-Twenties or the Three per cent. certificates is not free from difficulty. If the Three per cent. certificates are used in large amount in effect to contraction, as they constitute part of the reserve of banks, and they would need to be replaced with legal tenders; which contraction Mr. BOUTWELL supposes would, by the late the spirit of the Act of January 25, 1868, which suspends the operation of the law to authorize contraction. If, on the other hand, the Three per cent. certificates are not used in the Sinking Fund, the Government might exhaust all its surplus means in constituting the fund, and be exposed to a demand for the payment of the Three per cent. certificates at a time when the Treasury was weak. The amount of those certificates outstanding on the 1st of May last was $53,240,000, upon which there was then accrued interest amounting to $931,700. The principal had been reduced $165,000 up to the 1st of June.

During the pinch last year caused by locking up legal tenders about $12,000,000 of such certificates were disposed of to have been present to meet the pressing necessities of National banks. The happening of a similar contingency under a like money market is not improbable. If the Treasury were weak those certificates which are payable on demand would be presented without doubt. The strength of the Treasury is an inducement for allowing them to remain where they are.

It has been suggested that Mr. BOUTWELL intends to apply the surplus, one per cent. of the whole debt to the Sinking Fund, but not what Mr. M'CULLOCH omitted. This is scarcely possible, as six fiscal years have already elapsed since the first of July, 1862, and the amount would be larger than could be spared, especially as the Three per cent. certificates might be demanded.

There is still another embarrassment in forming the Sinking Fund out of the Three per cent. certificates. They are payable on demand; and although it is competent for the Secretary of the Treasury to stop the running of interest under the 4th section of the Act of February 25, 1862, which section governed in creating the certificates, it would be difficult to find the fund it might not suit the interests of the holders to expose their customers to the serious contraction which their withdrawal would occasion. By stopping the interest some portion of them would doubtless be presented, not enough to produce severe contraction, but yet possibly enough to save himself from the dilemma which might be caused by the presentation of too large an amount after the Treasury had been severely depleted by purchasing the Five-Twenties.

We present these matters from no feeling of hostility to the management of the Department, nor with a view to propound any theory. Mr. BOUTWELL undoubtedly feels confidence in his ability to keep up the Sinking Fund to what was intended in 1862, from the determination evinced by General GRANT and his Cabinet not only to collect the whole revenues with promptitude and vigor, but also to apply them with all possible economy and integrity. In this contrast to the policy of President JOHNSON is comprised nearly all that is required for success; but, as it would appear that we are about to enter upon a career in our finances more difficult than the one through which we have passed, it will need to be considered whether efficiency in collections will enable the Government to meet all the contingencies of the new station.

The question whether it is politic to create a Sinking Fund does not now arise, as the Act of February 25, 1862, remains unrepealed and unaltered. There is great force in what General GRANT said in his inaugural that if an act of Congress is impolitic it should nevertheless be rigidly enforced, for then the proper remedy would be applied. Mr. BOUTWELL finds the Act on the statute book in full force, and no complaint can be made of compliance with its provisions. But whether to construct the Sinking Fund wholly of Five-Twenties, and to remain exposed to a sudden demand for the Three per cent. certificates at a time when the money market is tightened up by the periodical transfer of currency to the interior, owing to the simultaneous action of speculators, must be decided as exigencies arise.

PARTY "CAPITAL."

We have said elsewhere, in speaking of the English question, that it is perhaps fortunate that Congress is not in session, for it is very certain that there would be resolutions introduced more rhetorical than wise, and every honorable gentleman who could express a warm hostility to England would doubtless do so without regard to adjectives. Public opinion would be excited, and emphatic resolutions, introduced and passed by the Republican majority, would be regarded as a kind of party platform upon which every faithful member would be required to stand.

Indeed the obvious difficulty with any such question is, that, while it demands cool and careful treatment, it is likely to be caught up by many excitable and ardent gentlemen. CUBA, for instance, there were those who thought it necessary to do something to restore the prestige of an administration of their party, and who saw an unsettled foreign question upon which a very strong public feeling existed, nothing is more probable than that they would instantly make it a party question. And as they would take a positive position, not for the purpose of procuring a just settlement of the question, but for party effect, nothing is clearer. This is what every sensible man must feel to be the real peril of the English complication. "Fifty-four forty or fight!" was the cry against England in the time of POLK. And there is no such a cry justly there was necessary a knowledge of the facts which could not be generally assumed.

We observe a report that certain Pennsylvania politicians propose to "make capital" out of the Alabama question, and to impose it as a test of the Republican party issues to be made at the next election. "Those," says the report, "who are directing the movement feel positive that it will prove eminently successful in strengthening the Republican party, and produce a good moral effect." It is further stated that Mr. CURTIN, the new Minister to Russia, Mr. FORNEY, and Mr. COLFAX, and probably Senator SUMNER are interested in the movement. An effort is also to be made to persuade the Pennsylvania Republican Convention to "take high ground" upon the subject.

In this country the people are the government, and the policy of the administration will naturally represent the will of the people. But the people are morally bound not to insist upon any policy which they have not carefully considered, and the understanding of which they do not fully understand. Those who in the press or from the platform, or in other ways, lead or influence public opinion, are equally bound to the candid consideration of every subject. Now, to treat the Cuban question, or the English question, or any foreign question whatever, purely as a party question, to make it a party, without regard to the real merits of the dispute or to the honor of the country, is a proceeding which no honest man and good citizen can approve. Our party friends will remember that there was a very strong pressure privately brought to bear upon the Chicago Convention to adopt a resolution which would have committed the Republican Senators who voted against the conviction of ANDREW JOHNSON—a judgment in which a majority agree with them. But the effort had been successful, and the party had gone into the late election with such a plank in the platform, would the position of the party have been higher or the chances of its success greater?

If the attempt shall be made in the Pennsylvania Republican Convention, or in any other, to commit the party to any Fifty-four-forty-or-fight doctrine, we hope that those who propose it will be compelled to show how much they know of the subject. The mere passage of a stringent resolution without debate may help to perplex the situation, but it can not have any moral weight. Vehement expressions of hostility to any foreign country with which there is some difficulty, or toward which for any reason the public feeling is not kindly, are always received with acclamation. But it is not so that a great nation treats itself or other nations justly. The maxim, "Our country, may she be always right, but right or wrong our country," is interpreted by another, "My purse, may it be honestly full, but a full purse any how." And when, as now, the best friends of this country in England so cordially agree upon the indefensibility of the escape of the Alabama, what we most need is not party heat, but patriotic wisdom.

SPAIN.

THE Spanish Cortes has adopted a liberal monarchical constitution, and the Republican members have apparently decided not to secede nor protest. This decision has probably been anticipated, and will therefore occasion no surprise. But the immediately interesting point to us in the Spanish situation is its treatment of Cuba. Signor ESCALAR asserted the Administration principle so boldly that it was to be hoped the Cortes would agree to try its operation in America. That every people shall govern itself without foreign interference is the American principle; and when a foreign country, however imperfectly and traditionally related to Spain, plainly wishes to govern itself, the opportunity of permitting it to do what Spain is herself doing, would seem too remarkable not to be eagerly embraced if the Cortes were really persuaded of the expediency of the principle. That the offer has not been made shows that the real revolution is like many others. Those who took part in it passionately desire their own liberty. BURKE says that shareholders are peculiarly sensitive and brave in defense of their own property.

The Provisional Government of Spain plainly intends to retain Cuba if it can. But in sending a new Governor-General with the representation of CABALLEROS DE RODAS it does what ISABELLA might have done. It seems a mere continuation of the BOURBON policy. Its tendency can only be to make the new regime in Spain as hateful as the old. Meanwhile the counter-revolution in Havana, the forced repression of the Cuban Junta, and the unbridled severity of the Volunteers, is of the worst promise. With a Governor of the reputed character of DE RODAS, and a general in the field like VALMASEDA, and with a military force like the Volunteers, a conflict of the most sanguinary kind seems to be impending.

The conduct of the Spanish Government at home is meanwhile rapidly destroying all sympathy that might justly be felt for it. At the moment of writing there is practically no civil government in Cuba. The Republic, of which we speak elsewhere, is of course only an army in the field; the Spanish authority is mostly that of the army in the north. Without moneys troops from Spain the mob, or the Volunteers, can not maintain themselves, and Spain has no more troops to send. Whether the new Governor arrives he must be either the master or the slave of the Volunteers; and he will find more contests than those with the Cubans. Spain seems to be unequal to the emergency.

THE DEAD SOLDIERS.

GENERAL LOGAN, as Commander-in-Chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, has issued an order explaining why the graves of the rebel soldiers are decorated with those of the Union soldiers. He says that it is from no vindictive emotion, but from the wish to distinguish the feeling with which the nation regards devotion and bravery. The politician regards only those of a slave-holding oligarchy. Chief Justice CHASE has also written a letter in reply to an invitation to attend the ceremony of decoration in Charleston. He asks, "May we not indulge the hope that ere long we who adhered to the national cause will be prompt also to join in commemorating the heroism of our countrymen who fell on the other side?" It is a pity that the career of the Chief Justice suggests the suspicion that his motives are always written with one eye upon the White House. Certain it is by this letter has the distinction of suggesting a reconciliation which is not equal to the festival of decoration by making it worse than meaningless.

General LOGAN'S order states the case truly. The gallant rebel soldiers are decorated, not because they are dead and were brave, but because they gave their lives and their heroism to the rebellious cause. CHASE was undoubtedly honest in his convictions. Is he therefore to be equally honored with ABRAHAM LINCOLN? That the rebel soldiers were sincere and fought bravely has never been questioned; but they spent their lives and their valor for the most inhuman and detestable cause in history. Mr. CHASE entirely misconceives the case. It is not heroism that is honored in the decorations of the graves, it is humanity and justice. If he will go to Lexington and Concord and Bunker Hill he will find monuments to brave men who fell in the earliest battles of the Revolution. Does he think that they are commemorated for their bravery? No; it is for defending their country against unjust aggression. The tall gray shaft on Bunker Hill does not chiefly say, "These were brave men;" it says, "This was a great cause."

Undoubtedly General GAGE was as sure of his cause as PUTNAM or PRESCOTT or WARREN. Does the Chief Justice think his name should be carved upon the monument? Large PERCARIN at Lexington was as brave and sincere as the farmers upon whom he fired; shall he too be honored by a grateful America? Or is it a greater offense for an Englishman to assert the authority of the Crown in an English colony than for an American citizen to attempt to overthrow the Government and rend his country in order to perpetuate human slavery? There may be a question of the wisdom of the festival which the Grand Army has established, but there can be none that General LOGAN'S order of it is correct. It is intended, by refreshing the sweet memory of the brave boys who died for liberty and justice, our brothers whom slavery slew, to renew the national fidelity to the eternal principles of liberty upon which alone human society can be firmly founded. It may be doubted whether the method is wisely chosen. There can be no doubt that the object is as lofty as any that the American heart can cherish.

NATIONAL TEACHERS' ASSOCIATION.

We learn that the next Annual Meeting of the National Teacher's Association is to be held at Trenton, New Jersey, on the 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th days of August. Many arrangements have been made that a warm and hospitable welcome can be extended to all who attend the Convention. Papers have been promised upon important educational topics by the most prominent delegates of the Convention.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE Kansas Pacific Railway was attacked by Indians at Fossil Creek Station May 28. Two men were killed and two wounded. The station was also burn up and thrown a considerable distance from the railroad.

Ole Bull has accepted the invitation of the Executive Committee of the Boston Peace Jubilee to take part in the great musical festival. A dispatch says that he has written a waltz in the "Cotillon," and pronounces the acoustic qualities excellent. He is to play his own compositions, and will be backed by a corps composed by the orchestra of one thousand pieces.

A statement presented at the Treasury Department reveals the fact that since the year 1861 there has been paid into the Treasury, as interest on bonds, $1,000,000. The amount paid in each year is rapidly growing larger. In 1861 only $200 were paid in, while during the five months of this year over $18,000 have been paid in.

The diminution of the public debt during the month of May was $3,000,000. The debt since March 4 last has been over twenty millions.

Mr. Corcoran, the well-known banker of Washington, who recently donated his Art Depository to that city, has just made another benefaction—a home for the indigent widows of Washington—which is to be called after his wife. Provision is made for sixty widows of officers, clerks, and other worthy public servants of the poor. The institution to be under the direction of the Washington ladies. The buildings and grounds will cost $30,000.

It is reported that ex-Secretary Seward, accompanied only by his wife and his son, FRANCIS, has started upon a steamer trip to his Sitka estate, via San Francisco.

General C. C. Andrews, of Minnesota, who was appointed and confirmed Minister to Sweden, has been transferred to Sweden, vice J. J. Bartlett, recalled.

Mr. Sanford, appointed Minister to Belgium, has resigned, and J. Russell Jones, of Illinois, has been nominated to fill the vacancy.

The recent massacre by the Indians in Kansas was a horrible affair. It is reported that after the massacre "the tongues and hearts were cut out of the dead soldiers; the bowels of their legs were cut open and tied under their chins; pieces of flesh were cut from the bodies, and the fingers, and fingers and toes cut off, and the ears cut off and heads scalped." Further, that the fiends "boiled the hearts of their victims for delicacies."

FOREIGN NEWS.

NOW that the Suez Canal has been so nearly completed, Ismail Pacha, the Viceroy of Egypt, is making to secure the pledge of European governments to the neutrality of the Canal. He has sent a special envoy to set upon a European tour for that purpose.

The Emperor and Empress of Austria, accompanied by their children and suite, arrived at Venice, including representatives of all the chief cities of the kingdom, on the 5th inst. They were received at the Royal residence by the Municipal authorities, and a deputation to return to the Roman Church. The Emperor delivered a brief letter and a speech.

The Spanish Cortes has passed the new Constitution, and the Republicans have announced their intention to support it. The new Constitution was recognized by the Queen of Holland. An elaborate dinner in the afternoon the members of the Executive Committee of the Cortes, and the Ministers, visited the Chambers to a platform which was erected in front of the Cortes House. There the Ministers of the Cortes read the Constitution. It was received with loud cheers by the immense assemblage of people gathered in front of the platform.

Dates from the Spanish colonies have been received one-half, and a small export duty on sugar, which is expected to be collected soon.

Captain General Dulce sailed from Havana for Spain on the 5th, accompanied by four officials and the Bishop of Cuba. The Volunteers appear to have forced him to resign against his own wishes. They have removed the Governors of Cardenas and Colon, and proposed to establish a Triumvirate, consisting of prominent Spaniards, to govern the island till the Home Government is settled. The Governor and Chief Justice of Havana have resigned.

We give on page 388 an illustration of the landing of an expedition in the Bay of Nipe, on the Cuban coast. A recent semi-official from Havana reports that the "filibusters" have come to grief. They were, it is said, surprised and dispersed by one of the Spanish military columns. Three or four of the invaders, designated as foreigners, the only prisoners taken, were summarily shot. It is added that the cargo of the vessel in which the filibusters landed fell into the hands of the Spaniards. It consisted of twelve pieces of artillery, 1,000 rifles, with other ammunition, and a large number of barrels of hard bread and potatoes.

WESLEYAN FEMALE COLLEGE.

THE Wesleyan Female College of Cincinnati was founded in 1842. Its origin was humble and unpretending. But it did good, honest work; and in a very few years came to be regarded as one of the best educational institutions in the city. And from that time forward, through a period of over twenty years, it held a position and wielded an influence rarely attained by any institution, however munificently endowed. Its halls were filled to overflowing — nearly four thousand different individuals having been enrolled as students down to 1866. Its patronage was drawn from all parts of the land, not even excepting Oregon and California. The number of graduates bearing the diploma of the institution is three hundred and sixty.

The introduction of cheap scholarships led the institution to the brink of financial ruin. For a little time hope as to there being any future for the institution seemed to have altogether expired. And we have no hesitation in saying that but for the noble generosity of three Christian churches (Wesley Chapel as principal, and Morris and Trinity as partners in interest) the Wesleyan Female College would have been ruined.

Under the inspiration of this munificent donation, comprising the lot on which this building has been erected, and the adjacent lots now covered with elegant and costly dwellings, a new Board of Trustees was organized. They took time, proceeded cautiously, surveyed every step as they advanced. The public were disposed to complain of their tardiness; but they had fully determined that they would build on a solid foundation, even if it took them a generation to do so. They issued no scholarships, incurred no claim for stock, but asked from each and all the benefactors of the institution a free-will offering, given in the name of the Lord, for the Christian education of woman.

The result is before the public in this grand building, dedicated and set apart for the purposes of its erection. The valuation of the entire grounds and building, completely furnished, is $200,000.

The College opened for its new career September 30, 1868, under the presidency of Rev. LUCIUS H. BUGBEE, A.M., known as an educator of years' standing. The different professorial chairs are ably filled by gentlemen and ladies of experience and recognized ability. The register will show an attendance of some two hundred and fifty the current year. The instruction of the College aims to give a high and solid culture to young women, as an examination of the courses will indicate.

THE HAYES MEDAL.

We give herewith an engraving of the gold medal recently awarded to Dr. I. I. HAYES by the Geographical Society of Paris, which is the sixth compliment our countryman has received from foreign governments and societies for his Arctic explorations and services — the former ones being the British "Arctic Medal;" a special medal from the British Government to the members of the Kane Expedition for their "generous services" in the search for SIR JOHN FRANKLIN; the PATON'S Medal of the Royal Geographical Society of London for 1867; honorary membership of the Royal Geographical Society of Berlin; and the decoration of Officer of the Order of Guadalupe from the late chivalric though unfortunate Emperor MAXIMILIAN of Mexico.

OBVERSE.

REVERSE.

MEDAL PRESENTED TO DR. I. I. HAYES BY THE GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY OF PARIS.

The ceremony of the presentation of the French medal appears to have been attended with all that delicacy for which the French are so eminently distinguished. It took place in a full meeting of the society April 30, to which the American Minister, General DIX, was specially invited, with the assurance of the members that it would be very agreeable to them if he would receive the medal in behalf of Dr. HAYES.

The reply of General DIX on this occasion, made in French, which the General speaks with the ease of a native, was peculiarly happy, and was received with great cordiality.

The following is a translation of it:

"M. le President,—I have listened with the greatest interest to the account given by your secretary of the discoveries made by Dr. HAYES in the Arctic regions, and it will afford me much pleasure to place in the hands of my distinguished countryman the medal which your society has been pleased to award him. The solution of the problem of the existence in the Polar regions of an open sea, which can be reached by navigation—a problem which DR. HAYES endeavored to solve, and in which he made such remarkable progress—is reserved for other enterprising and scientific individuals; and it is to be hoped that the French expedition now fitting out under the direction of M. LAMBERT, will lead to still more satisfactory results. It is possible that these researches may enlighten us in regard to a question like that which has existed in regard to the summits of the highest elevations on the face of the globe: that we may learn on what conditions human life may be preserved in the presence of such extreme severity of temperature; or whether nature had locked up the secrets of organic existence in chambers of frost into which man is not permitted to penetrate. In these researches, as in all other pursuits of science, it is a great good fortune (as you have said, M. le Président) that her empire is without bounds; that her votaries acknowledge no national demarkations; and that the sole object of her labors and her triumphs is to carry the victorious arms of knowledge and truth into the dominions of ignorance and error. Permit me to add, M. le Président, in response to your opening address and the friendly sentiments you have expressed to my country, that it is a source of sincere satisfaction to me and my fellow-citizens to see France and the United States co-operating, as befits their ancient friendship, in these questions of science, and I beg you to be assured that your society, in distinguishing the labors of two of my countrymen, Dr. KANE and Dr. HAYES, by such honorable testimonials of its approbation, has a just claim to our warmest acknowledgments."

This speech of General DIX, which was followed by warm and hearty applause, closed the proceedings of the Society, so far as affected the presentation of the Medal.

THE NIPE EXPEDITION.

THE Bay of Nipe on the Cuban coast is a grand natural harbor. Its entrance is half a mile in width, and there is no bar. Inland it widens out into a broad, deep, landlocked bay, penetrating far into the island. It was in this bay that, on the 11th of May, in broad daylight, the steamer Perrit dropped anchor with arms and munitions of war sufficient for the supply of a force of 5000 Cubans. Notwithstanding the fact that there was a Spanish redoubt in plain sight the steamer entered without molestation, and before 3 o'clock P.M. on the 12th had landed half her cargo. She had on board a detachment of Americans and Europeans—men who not long since were engaged in fighting for another cause. These supplies, landed from time to time by steamers at various points on the Cuban coast, are of the utmost importance to the Cubans. It rarely happens, however, that a ship is so fortunate as the Perrit, which landed her cargo under the very guns of a Spanish redoubt. Our sketch on page 388 very truly represents the occurrence of which we write.

EUROPEAN VINEYARDS.

THE most interesting work ever issued on the vineyards of Europe has just been published by Messrs. Harper & Brothers. It is from the pen of Mr. William J. Flagg, a son-in-law of the late Nicholas Longworth of Cincinnati. "I think," he says in his preface, "my work will be found, in some degree, interesting to the general reader, if he have curiosity, which Hume defines as 'the love of learning.' I think, too, it may prove instructive to the general drinker as well, inasmuch as it relates to his daily beverages, and their effects on his health and happiness. But my chief aim has been to convey information, both practical and theoretical, bearing on the important matter of wine-growing in America." In connection with this, his principal object, the author especially calls attention to the following points:

1. Long pruning, which, as commonly practiced in America, I deem to have been an efficient cause for the decay of our vines.

2. Mildew, the want of which, especially in the Ohio Valley, I feel quite certain has been equally injurious.

3. The advantage of growing wine on plains rather than on hills, except where the quality obtained from hill-grown vines is such as will compensate for their larger cost and smaller yield.

4. Cooking in unglazed vessels without stoken, as probably better adapted to our warm summers than the expensive methods handed from countries where peaches can only be ripened on trees flattened and fastened to the south sides of houses.

5. Red wine, as preferable to white, for the future beverage of Americans.

6. The sulphite-cure, as entirely efficacious against the disease of the vine in all its many forms, if only well applied.

"Probably"—as the writer justly claims—"no other American has made near so thorough a pilgrimage among the vineyards of Europe..... and certainly not among those of France."

We will give a few extracts from this instructive and entertaining work:

FOG MEDICINE.

A fanciful theorizer has said that all good English comedies were written before the time of the Methuen treaty, which was about a hundred and fifty years ago, arguing thence that only pure wine can inspire pure wit. It is very true that both England and America mostly import their good plays from France, in shape of translations or adaptations; but I can hardly believe it was ever possible to import them in the form of casks of Bourdeoux or bottles of Burgundy; and think, with Sir Emerson Tennent, that British palates have always craved what was mixed, muddled, and strong, which, he says, is because of fogs. If so, then so much the worse for the British, I say, and all the more shame for us, who, with no fogs to excuse it, have, from mere force of example, learned to love fog medicine—port, sherry, Madeira, whisky, and rum—which, in our dry climate, rend us as they never do a Briton in his home.

HOW BURGUNDY GETS ITS BODY.

Often it is necessary to resort to artificial heat in aid of the fermentation. One way is to heat a portion of the must to the boiling point and then return it to the vat. A good temperature for the must to show when a thermometer is introduced is from 80° to 90° Fahrenheit. The experiment has been tried of adding a quantity of white wine, itself in an active state of fermentation, to serve as a kind of yeast.

So long as things work well in the vats nothing of the kind is needed. But there is another mode of rousing up the slackening process, and at the same time bringing the skins and seeds which have settled to the bottom into contact with the new-made alcohol, so that the latter may combine well with the coloring matter they contain. This consists in stirring up the whole mass from bottom to top. It is done twice during the process of fermentation. It needs a good one hour's hard work each time. It is done by men. It takes four men to do it well. They all strip naked—naked as Adam when he was good—and then they go in—into the wine-vat—chin-deep they go in, and there, with feet and arms, fingers and toes, turn over, stir about, and mix the liquid that was getting clear with the pomace that was depositing itself, and "Make the gruel thick and slab,

And like a hell-broth boil and bubble."

The nice, sweet Bordelais man only puts his foot in it, but the Burgundian goes the whole figure.

It is done to give the wine a full body. They call it fermenting on the skin.

He who explained all this to my astonished mind avowed with the simple frankness of a Feejee cannibal, who admits his fondness for what he calls "long pork." But the Feejee people are only heathens.

JOLLY NUNS.

It rained continuously. No vintaging could be seen, and attention soon tired of the look-out at the window of the coupé, so I looked in. Two nuns were with me—not handsome, of course, for in France beauty is too precious a commodity to shut up in convents—but very jolly and talkative, and better company than the holy women I had met in America; and, though their ideas were limited enough, still a seeker after wisdom could learn a good deal from them. When I told them the great majority of my countrywomen esteemed it a sin to drink a drop of wine, they were astonished, and one nearly asked, "Must they drink only beer, then?" adding, "I drink no beer." But when the last beer too was forbidden, they fell to pitying the poor Protestants, whom they had not thought were so austere. "But," I said, "we are free." "Yes, must do penance; it is for the safety of the soul; but the good God does not require his creatures to injure their health by their abstinences."

Abstinences! Poor girls! If a marquis with 200,000 francs income, young, handsome, and agreeable, were to offer himself, a either of them, she would abstain from him teetotally with might and main as if on peril of perdition, yet she could put her quart of wine daily under her corsets and thank God for it in her prayers; while many a Protestant dame on our side, taught from childhood to believe it "liquid poison" to body and "liquid damnation to soul," thinks it a sin and a shame to moisten her red lips with one drop of parent Margaux, on whose conscience a hundred warm kisses accepted by those same lips would rest as lightly as a thistle-down on Plymouth Rock.

A VINTAGE DANCE.

Near the close of the day we arrived at Pauillac, and I found out and entered a little old inn in the heart of a labyrinth of narrow streets, where a tough, chirpy old woman received me as if she had always known and long been expecting me. She showed me into just what I wanted to learn, and, having shown me the chamber where I was to lodge, and the parlor where I was to eat, took me to the kitchen, and displayed the preparations she was making for a band of vintagers soon to arrive from their work in the vineyards—for she was herself a proprietor, it seemed. Sitting the lid of a large kettle, and letting me see of a sucrose vaporous cloud, she told me it was the vintage broth, a dish of great antiquity. Judging from the preparations, the vintage broth was a large one. In the inn she had a farm of no small value—was rich, in fact, but it was her humor to keep tavern. The proprietors, she said, always fed the band of vintagers, and gave them three repasts daily: the first, at eight o'clock, consisted of only bread and grapes; the second, at the field, at noon, of soup and soup-meat; and the last, in the evening, of soup and a ragoût of meats. Bread and wine were supplied "ad libitum," which means without stint. The wine is made of inferior grapes, gathered from young vines usually crushed and put into a barrel with the head out. As soon as fermentation has well begun a certain quantity of water is added, the cask is nearly filled to foot, and the liquor placed at the discretion of the drinkers. One franc a day is paid to the vintagers, and those are called who are picked from the vines, and for such as carry them to the wagon a franc and a half. But a few years ago wages were one-fourth lower.

After my dinner I had grapes for dessert, and they were choice bunches, and good as any I afterward tasted at Médoc, but I cannot call them delicious. Nor did I ever taste a vintage in Switzerland, or Germany find any to equal the Catawbas of the Ohio Valley in their prime.

In the evening I went to see a vintage dance at a château just outside the town. Under a shed, lighted with a single candle, twenty or thirty of the younger vintagers were dancing in wooden shoes on the bare ground. The figure was simply the old pantaloon cotillon of "forward two," "cross over," "right hand left," "do si do," and "balloe" chain, the couples were placed in two opposite rows, as in a contra dance, and not as in a quadrille, so that the dancers were continually in motion. Occasionally this was varied by a few rounds in waltzing order, performed with a kind of balance step, the partners holding hands and facing each other. They did not hug, as fashionable people do, nor was there any rudeness, or romping, or boisterous conduct of the men, and far less any sign of drunkenness.

A burly gentry, played by the overseer of the troop, was all the music they had. The overseer is a kind of middle-man, who recruits the band in the neighborhood of large estates, and conducts them from place to place while vintage lasts, sub-letting them at a price which yields him a profit of two or three cents on the labor of each person.

I had seen vintage dances before this, at the theatre; here there was always a row of brilliant foot-lights, and a large orchestra, and the dancers wore blue and red bodices, with close sleeves, and broad white ruffles around their gay ribbons, and had neat slippers on their feet, and pink stockings on their legs, quite unlike any thing in the way of dress to be seen at Pauillac. One of the wooden shoes, flung from a maiden's foot as she whirled by in a waltz, struck my knee with centrifugal force. As the Cinderella who owned it kept on with her dancing, I had time to examine the "sabot." It was nicely made, of good shape, and light, furnished with a simple leather "upper" nailed to the edge of the sole. The foot was only covered with a thick hose. Many people in France, who live in the country, wear this kind of shoe in muddy weather from choice, and three sixths of the whole army. An American, with common-sense enough to adopt them for himself and family, could save sufficient income the birth and coming of age of his oldest child to buy a farm.

"Here is where they sleep," said my guide, as he stepped from the carriage. He looked in and saw merely a large room in an out-building, the floor of which was covered with a comfortable thickness of clean straw mixed with straw some forty vintage youths and maidens were to sleep that night. This, they told me, was the usual mode of lodging laborers. They seemed very happy—and why should not they be? those foraging hands, tramping from one merry harvest-field to another, leaving the world for nothing, free for the time from home restraints, fed and lodged in fine country as well as fair, earning wherewith to buy clothes for the year by light, social, and agreeable labor in the day, and enjoying a vintage supper and vintage dance in the evening, eating "a discrétion," drinking "à discrétion," and sleeping "à discrétion."

"WEARING OF THE GREEN."

BY JUSTIN M'CARTHY.

"So you are really going to Ireland, old fellow, and at such a time?"

"Yes. Why not?"

"Look out for the Fenians! See that they don't capture you, and keep you as a British hostage."

"Stuff! There are no Fenians."

"Oh, must be. Stephens, Kelly, Sy, by St. Patrick, and Fenianesses, too—just ask Gerald Barrymore!"

"Why, I am going over to Gerald Barrymore. I am going to spend the time with him—hunt and course and fish, and all the rest of it."

"Well, Sy says there are lots of them."

"Don't believe a word of it, although I am sure he thinks it if he says so. There isn't pluck enough in the whole country to raise or bring like a formidable movement of any kind. I'll undertake to rout any band of Fenians that may come my way with a horse-whip."

"Misguided young man, farewell. If you should fall a victim to your rashness, I'll write your epitaph!"

"Thank you, my dear fellow! That is indeed adding a new terror to death. It will make me doubly careful of my precious existence!"

So the two friends parted, smiling. This dialogue took place one of the last days of late autumn in the pleasant Temple Gardens, in the heart of London—the Temple Gardens of York and Lancaster, where the ghosts of the Roses of Addison and Steele and Sir Roger de Coverley; of Ruth, Peckaniff, and Tom Pinch; of Arthur Pendennis and Esmond, still linger.

The two friends who thus talked and parted were Tom Gibbs and Laurence Gerald. Both were young barristers, and both as yet briefless; both were writers for newspapers and magazines; both were distinguished and active members of the Inns of Court Volunteer Corps, by military known as the "Devils' Own."

Laurence Spalding was a tall, athletic young fellow, who delighted in the athletic and the riflesh oting, and the privilege, new, strange, and dear to young lawyers, of wearing the mustache. He it was who on the eve of a visit to Ireland was speaking scorn of Fenianism, and the natives of Ireland generally. He had been born in that island, and this was just the time when the air was rife with rumors of projected Fenian insurrection. Just before parting from his friend, about to place to divulge the real proportions of Fenianism's military strength. Laurence Spalding was to be a guest of his old friend and fellow-student, Gerald Barrymore, a young Irishman who had eaten his way to the English bar, and hoped to distinguish himself there, although, as a student of his compatriots, he was heir to some property in Ireland which was actually unencumbered. Spalding was hoping to see Ireland: longing to enjoy his friend's hospitality: longing to be introduced to his friend's beautiful sister, of whom he had heard so much.

Barrymore was going over to Ireland that night. Spalding was to follow in two or three days. Barrymore was to meet him in Dublin, and show him over the city; then they were to go on together to Barrymore's home in a mountainous, sea-washed, southwestern county. The railway would only carry them a certain way; the rest of the journey must be made by carriage or on horseback over mountain roads.

Now it so happened that Tom Gibbs, who was a good deal of a chatter-box and a little of a mischief-maker, met Gerald Barrymore half an hour after the conversation just reported, and told him, with perhaps some flourish and embellishment, what Laurence had been saying about Irishmen, and the dangers of Irish rebellion. Barrymore's cheek reddened. He was, like most Irishmen, extremely sensitive of ridicule; and, moreover, although a loyal British subject, he had been discanting somewhat largely at the dinner in the Temple upon the formidable nature of the Fenian movement. So he felt a good deal annoyed for the moment at what Gibbs told him; but his natural generosity presently returned, and he resolved to think no more about it. Unluckily, however, when he got to his Irish home he told his sister something of the story, and that young lady's pretty cheek and bright eye glowed with pique and resentment.

Grace Barrymore was a bright, animated, beautiful girl, with a noble, queenly figure, and curling fair hair. She was highly educated, had lived in Dublin for a long, half the winter of an Englishwoman of the best class, and yet retained an exquisite flavor of her own rare nationality. She was the only motherless girl, and ruled her father and the estate and the tenantry and the whole district generally. Like many other true Irishwomen who have not seen other countries besides their own, she scoldher compatriots a good deal for their own peculiarities, but would be the first to resent against them by a foreigner, especially a Saxon. She was always warning all of "the place people" against making themselves up with the dangerous follies of Fenianism; and she did not at present know of the existence of any Englishman but herself, but she clenched her little fist, and bit her red lip, and mentally vowed vengeance when she heard that a certain Englishman had dared to sneer at the courage of Fenianism and the danger of Irish insurrection.

Two of these days passed away, and Laurence Spalding landed for the first time at Kingston the port of Dublin, where his friend Barrymore received him. Three days more of three other days very joyously in the pleasant city. Every where they heard talk of Fenianism, and expected "every day" the most dreadful kind, having for their object the overthrow of throne, church, altar, private property, and every thing else that could be thought worth having. Gerald Barrymore shook his head gravely; Laurence Spalding laughed loudly.

"Laurence," said Barrymore, I do wish I had been more fortunate in choosing my time to bring you over here. Down in my neighborhood they say things are serious. Rumor was one of that class of Englishmen who never believe in any thing unusual until they see it, who rule out from belief in Naples and Sicily, scoffing at stories of brigandism, and get taken by brigands; who ramble heedless of danger in times of anarchy, bathe in shoal water where sharks are said to abound, and do other such deeds of almost suicidal folly.

The two friends went by the railway as far as they could go. Then a carriage met them, and they proceeded for a short while. Spalding was given to understand would last a couple of days. The carriage had a pair of strong, sinewy horses. The driver and the attendants were both armed with pistols. Gerald Barrymore deposited pistols in the carriage holsters.

"I wish you had one at home. Mastber Gerald," observed the driver.

"So do I, Tim. How are things looking just now?"

"Terrible bad, Mastber Gerald!"

"Thrue for you, boy!" growled the postilion, in assent.

"The whole side of the country is up, I'm tould," said the driver.

"More power to it, boy," growled the postilion.

"What nonsense," laughed Laurence, and he turned to Barrymore. "Do you really believe in this talk as bad?"

"My dear Spalding, you don't know my thing of this country. I only hope you may not be compelled to form a disagreeable experience."

Laurence shrugged his shoulders. His friend was evidently not amenable to reason on this subject, which Laurence still settled himself down by process of intimation—the best possible way of dealing with difficult political and national questions.

They drove on for some hours, Spalding and Barrymore smoking and pleasantly chatting, although Barrymore was occasionally casting anxious glances on either side of the road, and every now and then examining his pistols. At last they came into a dark and gloomy defile, a narrow gorge almost as wild as an Alpine pass, and which seemed to stretch on for miles.

"If we were through this," said Barrymore, in a low tone, as if speaking to himself, "I think we would be safe for this day."

"Are there highway robbers about?" asked Spalding.

"Highway robbers here? Oh no!"

"What else, then?"

"The Fenians!" said Gerald, in a low and solemn voice.

Laurence threw himself back in the carriage and quietly laughed.

Just at that moment a shot was heard, and the driver pulled up the horses.

"Begorra, they're on us, sure enough!" he exclaimed.

"We're taken, Spalding," said Gerald, calmly.

Laurence craned his neck out and saw that a small body of men, armed with guns, were drawn across the road, and that two were at the horses' heads.

Before he could leap out of the carriage a dozen men were at the side of it. One had a sword. They wore a sort of uniform, and each had a green sash.

"Surrender, gentlemen!" said the swordsman, politely.

"Surrender to what?" demanded Gerald, fiercely.

"To the soldiers of the Irish Republic," was the reply. "Look at our flag." One of the men was indeed bearing a green flag.

Gerald's answer to the summons was the discharge of one of his pistols, which, however, was discharged in vain. Laurence fired the other, but it too failed of its object. Then both the young men leaped from the carriage and gallantly attacked the troops of the Irish Republic. Laurence hit out with good scientific arm, and Gerald with characteristic vehemence. "Hurrah for us! Hercules contra duos—what could two do against twenty? Our poor friends were very soon bound round the arms with strait cords, and rendered incapable of resistance.

The driver and postilion had from the beginning fraternized with the Fenians.

"You see, gentlemen," said the swordsman, "how useless was your resistance. You have had shot one of our men I probably could not have saved your lives."

"I suppose this means robbery," said Laurence. "If so, you may as well rifle our pockets at once."

"You are an Englishman, and of course ignorant of Ireland," said the leader, calmly, "I excuse your insolent remarks. But you had better not let any of the men around hear you speak of them as robbers."

"Then, if you are not robbers and cut-throats, what the devil are you?"

"Feinans!"

"Feinans be—blessed!" observed our British hero.

"You had better, for your own sake, Sir, be silent. Get into the carriage."

Laurence and Gerald were promptly lifted in. The leader and another man got in likewise. The word to march was given, and the carriage moved on. Laurence could hardly believe the evidence of his senses. He felt like a man in a dream—like the victim of a nightmare. He gazed at his friend, who sat silent and calm, bearing defeat ungraciously. As he turned round rather abruptly his elbow struck against something hard. It was the driver, which one of his guards was kindly holding toward his prisoner's breast as a little measure of precaution.

"I'm the same as the devil, Gerald, and Laurence, speaking now in French that his captors might not understand, "that is the meaning of all this? Is it a dream? Is it a preposterous joke, or a piece of mummery? Who are these canaille?"

"M. Barrymore has no difficulty in comprehending," said the man with the sword, in fluent French, and with exceeding accent. "He understands his country, although he refuses to fight in her cause, and has degenerated so far from the ambition of his ancestors as to show himself the enemy of her flag. M. Barrymore was offered a command only the other day, and declined. He will have to answer now for his desertion."

Laurence looked at Gerald. They did offer him a command, and Barrymore, really? Of course I declined. I am a loyal man. Now I am in their power. Let them kill me if they choose—I am quite capable of it."

Again Laurence mentally asked himself, "Am I dreaming? Am I mad? Is this the year 1867? Where is standing the Times this morning?"

He gave up the whole conundrum in despair.

A dreary hour or two passed away, and Laurence awoke from a dull fast sleep to find awoke when some of his captors were lifting him out of the carriage. He now found himself standing on the top of a grassy lawn or field in the area of a large and partly ruined castle. There were cannon at the gates of the castle and on the roof, and there was a flag. It was the flag. Near was a whole mass of armed men. Laurence could see the gun-barrels glittering in the autumn sunset.

"Bring up the prisoners at once," said a messenger who came down to meet the Fenian band and their captives.

"Is the Chief here?" asked the man with the sword.

"No: the Chief's across the river. He's to attack in the morning airly, I'm tould. But she's here—and she'll be mighty angry with some people. I'm thinking!" and he cast a glance at Laurence and Gerald.

"Gentlemen," said the man with the sword, "you are about to be brought before the Chief's daughter. In the absence of the Chief she commands here. For your own sakes I earnestly recommend prudence."

Gerald shrugged his shoulders contemptuously. Laurence began to think the whole affair rather interesting. The two young men were led between armed ranks toward the crowd in front of the castle. A space was cleared near the gates, divided, and a lady on horseback rode forward, some, with fair hair and a superb form, and she sat her horse like a queen. In all his bewilderment Laurence could observe her deep-blue, lustrous eyes, her clustering fair hair, her graceful gestures, her full, noble bust. She wore a green riding-habit, and a cavalier hat with a green feather. She had pistols in her belt, and a sword at her side.

"Am I assisting at a scene in the Opera Comiqne?' Laurence asked of himself. The ropes which bound the prisoners were removed, and the first use Laurence made of his freedom was to take off his hat and bow to the beautiful Amazon. She acknowledged his salute with grace and dignity.

"You are the Englishman?" she asked.

"I am an Englishman, certainly. May I ask whom I have the honor of addressing?"

"All that it concerns you to know, Sir, is, that I am at present in command of the rebels and these Fenian soldiers. My name your countrymen may know some day."

"They excuse me," said Laurence, "if I ask you one question. Do you really mean to tell me, Madama, that these fellows are Fenians—that there is a Fenian army?"

"Your ignorance, Sir—the blind, perverse ignorance of your countrymen—may perhaps be allowed to excuse your question, but I have no time to answer such folly. Look around you if you would learn. Now, we have something else to do. Gerald Barrymore!"

Her loud, clear tone rang like a trumpet-call. Barrymore stood forward silently, and bent his head.

"Gerald Barrymore, you have openly declared yourself a traitor to the cause of your country. You have refused to join us; you have done all you could to betray us to the enemy: to-day you actually dared to fire upon our flag. What have you to say why you should not die a traitor's death?"

"Good Heavens!" exclaimed Laurence; "can this be serious?"

"I have nothing to say," replied Gerald, calmly, "except that I am no traitor to my country, but a true patriot. I owe little or nothing even this to you. I know I can expect no mercy, and I don't ask any. Do your worst."

"Gerald Barrymore, I need not tell you that I would spare you if I could; that I have tried to win you to the true cause you know only too well. But the time has come when we can no longer hold any terms with traitors. This Englishman is only a foreign enemy—you are a renegade, a deserter, a traitor; and your doom is death!"

"Heavens, what a fury!" thought Laurence. Then he thrust his friend aside, and bowed into a regular oration addressed to the Amazon. It was a piece of impassioned declamation blended with high forensic arguments. What his appearance before known how eloquent he was, and how he had mastered all the principles of constitutional, international, and martial law. Pitt, Fox, Burke, Choate, Webster, and Jule Favre, all in one. Forgetting his private interests and his personality in the cause of his friend and client, the devoted advocate actually brought the Judge-Amazon not only the noble fire of his eloquence, but to bring dishonor on the great cause she represented, by violating the fundamental principles of honorable warfare. He thought only of addressing expression on her features—nay, she actually did for a moment cover her mouth with her handkerchief to hide her emotion—not to weep, but she controlled herself and said, with some severity in her tone:

"It is well for your friend, Sir, you forget yourself. You forget that we have no cause, no flag, no battle-field, no principles—nay, that there is no Fenianism, and that there are no Fenians!"

"The court is against me," thought poor Laurence, sadly; and abandoning the high ground of argument, he was about to speak simply in arrest of judgment, when the Fenian Chieftainess cut him short:

"Save your eloquence, Sir. We have little time here for the making of speeches. Gerald Barrymore, you have until sunrise to-morrow morning to decide your fate. If then you join our ranks and pledge your word of honor to serve us faithfully, you shall live. If not, you shall be shot as one of a traitor."

"On my word, Gerald," exclaimed Laurence, "I do think you had better join them. Come! After all you are an Irishman, you know; and I suppose it is somehow or other your national cause."

"The Englishman," said the lady, with a sweet smile, "is an honorable enemy, and touches a sensitive Irishman his pledge. You are prisoner! Mr. Spalding—that I think is your name?—you will do me the honor of dining with me. In my father's absence I am host and commandant."

"Much honored, I am sure," faltered Laurence; "but my poor friend Barrymore! How can I leave him?"

"My invitation, Mr. Spalding, is a command. We dine at seven."

She bowed, one of his captors touched him on the arm and led him away. He was conducted to a small room in the castle: a table was laid for two even where; at seven o'clock an armed escort came for him, and led him into a large dining-hall well lit and lighted. A table, placed at the right hand of the hostess, who looked unspeakably lovely in her complete evening toilette, a large number of retainers, a few of whom were the hostess's women attendants, dined at the table. Laurence drank Burgundy and Champagne, and grew into a condition of wonder and ecstasy such as he had not believed it possible this strange age could bring to mortal. His hostess was fascinating, bewitching. Nothing could surpass her brilliancy and beauty — not even her condescending, encouraging, almost tender friendliness. Laurence's susceptible soul was melting under her sunny influence. A harper played during the dinner some delicious plaintive Irish airs, and sang Irish words to them. Laurence knew nothing of music, and did not understand a word, but he demanded an encore enthusiastically.

The lady talked with him frankly and fervently of Fenianism, its strength and its hopes. She expressed utter amazement at the ignorance that prevailed on the subject in England.

"I declare to you," said Laurence, "if I were to go back to-morrow and tell people in London what I have actually seen here—seen with my own eyes—they would not believe me!"

"Extraordinary and infatuated people!" said the lady. "You shall return, Mr. Spalding, and endeavor to enlighten England. You shall go to-morrow if you will, if you are anxious to go. I will not detain you."

And he thought he heard a faint sigh; and her eyes rested kindly upon his. Ah, Lily, this time the thought of returning was hateful to Laurence's soul.

"Not to-morrow—oh, not to-morrow!" he pleaded. "In fact, you know, in order to do any good in England, I ought to see a little more of the strength of your movement. I had better wait—much better."

"To-morrow," said the lady, with another half-sigh, "you shall have a decisive answer. Should my father drive the enemy from the field we push forward; should he fail, we defend this castle until each man and woman in it perishes amidst the ruins!"

Laurence started. This exquisite creature to die, and by the weapons of his countrymen! He began to think whether it would be utterly dishonorable for Englishmen to adopt the cause of Ireland. After all, did not the Covenanters do this; and who could be finer fellows than the Geraldines? Why, confound it all! what was Silken Thomas, of whom he had heard his friend Barrymore speak in moments of exaltation? And, by-the-way, where was Barrymore, whose awful situation he had almost forgotten; of course if he joined the Fenian ranks Barrymore would be the same, and he could not do it. Still, the only disagreeable thing would be that perhaps Barrymore might become too agreeable to the Fenianesses! Laurence thought of this, and saw in her voice that day as she addressed poor Barrymore, even while she was pronouncing his death-sentence.

"No, Mr. Spalding," said the lady, gracefully rising from her seat, and looking at our hero with eyes of soft and tender expression—"you are a brave and generous enemy, and I can not allow you to peril your life for no purpose in our dangers. Accordingly, I have made up my mind your friend Barrymore shall be spared for your sake—return, and report us and our cause aright to the unsentient English. You shall go to-night, safely escorted to the English camp. If we triumph, you and I may meet again; if we fail, remember me sometimes as a friend. Now, then, and farewell!"

"Never!" exclaimed Laurence, passionately. "I will stay by you—fight for you! I renounce every thing for you! I am a Fenian for your sake. I will die for you, but I will not leave you!"

She took, without speaking, a green ribbon from the table and pinned a shamrock upon his non-lole. At the same time she made a signal to one of her attendants. Laurence pressed the ribbon to his lips, kissed it with her hand, bent over it, and touched it with his lips.

A peal of laughter rent the air, and Laurence, looking up amazed perceived that his friend Barrymore and several men whom he had met in Dublin standing around, and holding their sides in mirth as they pointed to his poor Spalding and his green order of Fenianism.

"Three cheers," cried Barrymore, "for the Fenian Volunteers!" And the uproar once schooed the wild response to the invitation!

The Fenian Chieftainess had fled, leaving the echo of a silvery peal of mercy laughter behind her!

Poor Laurence Spalding! Cruel, cruel Grace Barrymore! Treacherous friend, Gerald Barrymore! The whole affair from beginning to end was a wicked practical joke, played upon Laurence Spalding for his saucy sneer at Irish insurrection and the reality of Fenianism. The armed Fenians were the Barrymore tenantry, and even even the man with the sword who spoke French was a Barrymore cousin, and the Fenian Amazon was, of course, the charming Grace herself!

Only fancy Laurence's feelings as he came down to breakfast next morning and met the laughing eyes of Grace, who looked the very heart of grace; he had risen to the height of the situation, and he appeared in the breakfast-room with the green ribbon pinned to his coat-lapel!

He spent a few delightful weeks with the Barrymores, and was well repaid with hospitality and friendliness for his self-imposed task of being the upshot of the whole affair is that he has turned the tables, that he has become a captive of his fair captors, and that she is to be Mrs. Laurence Spalding; and he vows that all his life through he will be proud of his wearing of the Green.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

UNTIL recently the French Custom-house has prevented any foreign vessel from going up the Seine farther than Rouen; but lately, under the auspices of the Ministers of Marine and Interior, this has removed every impediment, and thrown open the port of Paris to the English ships, provided, of course, that they pay the amount of water required by the navigation of the Seine. At the last accounts the first English vessel that had ever entered Paris was moored at the Quai St. Nicholas, opposite the Tuileries. She is a sailing barge, sixty tons register, and is from Dundee. Of course the English colors attract crowds of Parisian and English visitors.

Some weeks ago the Czar of Russia was crossing a bridge in an open carriage with his son when the horses took fright, and, dashing across the foot-path, were only prevented by the parapet from falling into the river. The shock, however, was so great that the carriage was overturned, and broke from it. Indeed, so serious is his indisposition that his medical attendants are anxious in regard to his recovery.

A novel method of "dishing fire" was practiced at the recent great fire at Hunter's Point. Thousands of gallons of burning oil were spread over the surface of the water endangering a new bridge. There seemed to be no chance of saving it as the tide was setting in, although a multitude of people were on the banks witnessing the spectacle. By chance a by-and-by threw a stone into the water, by which the burning surface was broken and a clear space made of two or three yards. Instantly the idea was seized by bystanders, lines were formed to a brickyard, and several thousand bricks were thrown into the water, which checked and soon entirely extinguished the flames.

Tennyson is said to have a printing-press of his own at home, and to amuse himself with its hands or with his head. His copy comes to the publisher in type.

An interesting report has just been submitted to the Pennsylvania branch of the American Freedmen's Union Commission, indicating the progress of the work. Last year 90 schools were under the supervision of this Commission; but the freedmen contributed little or nothing toward the support of the schools. This year there have been 103 teachers in the field, and the freed-people contribute largely, and unanimously appreciate the advantages now offered to them. They are willing to work that their children may be educated.

By a recent act of the Legislature, several wealthy and public-spirited business men of New York have been made trustees of a corporate body, to be known as the "American Museum of Natural History." This society is organized for the purpose of establishing in this city a Museum of Natural History, to encourage the study of natural science, and kindred subjects, and to furnish popular instruction and recreation. Nearly $50,000 in subscriptions have already been raised by enterprise, and the Central Park Commissioners have generously offered a part of the fine ball in the Arsenal Building as a place where the collections may be deposited, and exhibited to the public until the erection of a permanent edifice.

On the day when Victor Hugo's "L'Homme qui Rit" was published in Paris, no less than eighteen translations of it appeared in various parts of the world. The translation for America had previously appeared.

A bird's nest was recently found in West Brookfield, Massachusetts, which was duly protected by a onecent revenue stamp, regularly canceled, and thoroughly attached to the nest by the builder.

A writer in the Springfield Republican, describes the monument to Secretary Recordon Day at Mount Auburn Cemetery, remarks that the most touching spot in the Cemetery, to those who know the story of it, was that where Dr. Lincoln and his daughter are buried buried. It is a small plateau, from one side of which spring a few sturdy oaks and cedars, and from the back and the direction of three flags marking the graves of General Charles Russell Lowell, Captain James Jackson Lowell, and their comrade, Lieutenant William Putnam, all grandsons of Dr. Charles Lowell, and nephews of the poet, all of whom were killed in battle. They were young men of great promise, and had distinguished themselves as officers. Long before the procession arrived at the grave, it was covered with flowers of purest white, to which the soldiers added their evergreen tributes.

The secret spies employed by Napoleon III. infest every street corner in Paris. A stranger will not assault, but a stranger will be watched. A correspondent absent in the respectable-looking man who is seated quietly in a cafe, or sauntering through the streets. The secret police are divided into brigades called Barcopres; the police de sureté, or bona fide detectives, who have extensive powers, and are under the safety of the community; the police who superintend the bureaus of health; and the political spies. To the first corps, which is very large, the uniformed policemen of various costumes, is added a body of 765 civilians, nearly as many uniformed officers of police, and a uniform a species of body-guard to the Emperor. When the Emperor goes out on foot bocquille, close behind him lurks one of the police de sureté; and when he rides out the chief of this corps always follows him, in an unostentatious carriage. The police de sureté comprise about one hundred special officers, who use their authority to prevent immorality from becoming too notorious, though not to punish moralists as men of bees. The political police in Paris consists of five hundred and fifty agents. From all considered to be both sexes. Many of them are Corsicans, who develop a remarkable talent for intriguing in politics.

A Parisian paper publishes some recollection with Victor Hugo by publishing "L'homme, qui baille" the man who yawns!

The Century Plant, or Striped-Leaved American Aloe, was raised to flower at the Genesee Valley Nurseries, Rochester, New York, is about seventy years old. It was purchased by the late Hugh Grieg, of Canadaigua, New York, in the year 1810, from Princess Caroline, Naples. Long before, and at last time was supposed to be nine or ten years old. Owing to its large size, and being so unwieldy, it was left in the garden when removed to Front de Cu's present house, about the year 1836, and has been to their possession ever since. In the 30th August last the flowering of its flowering were first observed, and the flowerstem has since grown nearly three inches a day, on the average. The number of leaves on the plant is thirty; each leaf is six feet six inches in length, the greatest circumference of the plant is thirty feet. The roof of the green-house has been raised thirty feet, to allow of the excessive growth of this majestic plant. It is a native of Mexico, and specimens in a platform has been erected, from which a better view of the flowering can be obtained when in bloom.

In 1826, De Vaca set out to cross the Continent, and spent eight years and endured great hardships in reaching the Pacific. In 1788, Jonathan Carver accompleted the passage further north, but failed. He, however, predicted that a route would be made some day over the same line by a great nation. Almost a hundred years afterward, one of Carver's descendants made a great effort to accomplish what he foretold, and in a Pacific railroad, and all in vain. But the wild dream of 1847 is realized in 1869. Now the traveler can go from the City of New York to San Francisco in about a week. At present the fare for the entire distance is nearly two hundred dollars, but it is believed that in the course of a year it will be reduced at least one quarter.

The smallest steam-engine in the world is now in the possession of John Penn, of Greenwich, England —the eminent maker of great engines. It will stand on a shilling, and weighs only three ounces, for its bore-plate measures only 3-8th of an inch by about 1-10th. From the extreme smallness of the model a few minutes—such, for instance, as the sit-pumps—have necessarily been omitted. Still, so small are some of the parts that they require a powerful magnifying-glass to see their form. The screws are only 1-50th of an inch diameter, and these are all duly furnished with hexagonal nuts, which can be loosened and tightened by a lilliputian spanner. The whole weight of the model is less than a threepenny-piece. It works admirably, and when working its crank-shaft performs from twenty to thirty thousand revolutions in a minute.

One of the latest sensational stories brings in a cat and a dog. An old lady in this city had long cherished a favorite cat, which evinced the same affection shown her in many ways. The two grew old together, and when a lingering illness attacked the old lady, puss watched by her bedside with all the sedulity of a well-trained nurse. But the old lady died. During the funeral services, while the corpse was being removed from the house to the hearse, mysterious sounds were heard within it. Services were suspended, and the coffin-lid opened, but the consonance of the deed was undisturbed. The entire top of the coffin was then removed, when, lying at the feet of the corpse, was discovered the dead body of the poor old cat. She had crawled under the coffin, bid the previous night, and the noise which alarmed the pall-bearers was her death-struggle. She had smothered in her close quarters.

"Where did you get that turkey?" said a colonel to one of his officers, after having eaten the tough bird the other day with a fine bird. "Stole it," was the laconic reply. "Ah!" said the colonel, "that's unlucky, to a by-stander, "you see my boys may steal, but they won't lie."

THE CHIGNON.

Horrid stories now are going
About a Chignon's dreadful curse;
And, ah me! it's worth the knowing;
What it is that one carresses.

After such revelation,
Think me not fastidious grown,
If I'm not fond of caressing,
Darling, are those locks your own?

AN EGG STORY.

"I do assure you, Mr. Jones, you know how fond my brother is of eggs?" Well, he was driving me once to the country to secure county votes, and he stopped at a little public house on the way to lunch. Bess said he believed he had been born with an egg-cup in his hand, and he sat by the window calmly eating, and throwing the shells out of the window. At last I got tired of waiting, and said:

"My dear, why don't you ask to sit there all day calling for more eggs?" 'Do let's go.'

"And when we got into our carriage, as he turned it around, he drove one wheel over the pile of eggs and shells. I said to him, my dear, that we were actually upset?"

A MODEL WILL.—The following is a copy of a will left by a man who died in Ohio a few years ago: "This is the last will and testament of me, John Thomas. I give all my things to my children, to be divided among them the best way they can. N.B.—If any body thinks my property is worth more than mine, I'm willing to let him have any thing. Signed by me,

"JOHN THOMAS."

WHO WOULDN'T BE MARRIED?

There exists not a shadow of doubt in my mind That my wife is the very best wife I can find: For she's always good-looking, handsome, neat, With the daintiest hands and the tiniest feet.

She prefers to stay at home of evenings, And my wife you must know is no more than a woman;

She's kind-hearted, loving, painstaking, and zealous, And then the dear creature's a splendid cook.

If I happen to glance at the cook's rosy face, At the end of her week cook is out of a place; But she's a treasure, and has a value not priced, She is thrust, bag and baggage, right into the street.

And their place is supplied by the ugliest creatures, With hideous features of colors and shapes; Who misshapen in limb and so hideous in hue, They are regarded by me with a feeling of horror.

The nurse-girl's a bright of the very first water: For I've heard her, I'm sure, a thousand times over, And 'tis perfectly true, though it sounds hyperbolic, That I look at the cook without feeling a chill.

We have visitors few, and their calls far between, Save sundry oil spinsters, tough, scraggy, and lean: And some gentility girls, who, when they're asked here Were the death of their lords, if the truth were but told.

If I thought 'twould conduce to my wife's peace of mind,

I would fervently pray to become deaf and blind; For as long as I'm able to make my own way, There's no peace for my wife and no comfort for me.

An old farmer in Ohio, having read that the State Fair Ground covered seven thousand square feet, and the last year by the labor of the convicts, sat some of the ground to rights, wrote the governor that "he'd better turn our Legislator into a penitentiary, by jimmy!"

PASSING THE TIME—Going by a clock.

"Prisoner, why did you follow this man, and beat and kick him so shamefully?"

"I am sorry, your Honor; I was a little drunk, and I thought it was my wife."

The other day a little girl presented a letter at the post-office. There being no stamp on it, the postmaster inquired why it was so. She had not brought three cents. "No," she replied, "father has put the stamp inside."

"LET US HAVE PEACE!"—FORTISSIMO. BOST

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY.

CHAPTER X.

AZALEA'S LETTER.

"I SAY, there's a letter for you," said Conrad, nudging Azalea, to call her attention to the fact.

"Oh," she cried, eagerly, "it must be from daddy! Where is it?—oh, where is it?"

It was just before the breakfast-hour: the children were gathered in the school-room, and the morning letters were lying in a salver near Miss Slater's hand.

Azalea opened hers with trembling fingers, and face in a glow of delight; but at the sight of a few straggling, crooked letters inscribed on the summit of the page her face changed woefully.

"Master Moore was tuck very bad this morn-in'." Such was the postscript old Betty had got her son, a "fine scholard," aged twelve, to add to Moore's letter to Azalea.

Poor Azalea read the rest of the letter through a blinding mist of tears. She quite missed the point of the deliciously limited temptation of puffy white rubbits. She remembered, with a pang of remorse, that it was a long time since the irregular verbs had assumed any shape or order in her mind.

"If you intend to have any breakfast you had better commence it once, as the things will be cleared away presently," Miss Slater said, harshly; and Azalea gulped down her tea, and tripped tears on to the bottom moiety of bread-and-butter; for the severest grief can not wholly do away with the instincts of hunger in a growing child.

When breakfast was finished, she arose and confronted Miss Slater.

"If you please, ma'am, I want to go home."

"Do you?" was the dry response; "and why?"

"Because my father is very ill," Azalea answered, with unusual humility in her shaking voice, "and I want to go to him directly."

"That is quite impossible," Miss Slater replied, calmly. "Lord Orme has gone to town for two or three days, and until I receive his instructions it is impossible that I should permit you to leave the house."

Azalea sank thoughtful and silent for a few minutes; then she walked to the door.

"Where are you going?" the governess asked, sharply.

"I am going to get ready to start," the child said, gravely. "I am going home to my father, who is very ill, and I want to go, and I will!"

She left the room as she spoke. Miss Slater was silenced, and somewhat taken aback by the child's grave decision of manner. Conrad whistled.

"Go it, ye cripples!" Tally-ho the grindery! how she screeches: and with that triumphant but mysterious mode of expressing his delight.

But Miss Slater was a woman prompt to determination. She went to her own room, without having put on Topaz's collar and chain, and her own hat and cloak, essayed to leave her bedroom, she found that the door was locked from the outside. She felt sick with anger and distress as the conviction that she had been trapped flushed on her. She beat the door with her hands and feet, and cried aloud in the hope of attracting some friendly assistance. Conrad, who was her sole auditory, explained to her in a gruff whisper that "Slater had got the key in her pocket."

He evidently did not feel equal to extracting it from that sacred refuge; but he was not unmoved by the vehement distress of his playmate. After a little deliberation the oracle spoke:

"It's no use trying the poker, it's grown thin from taking out grease-spots on the carpet. You must wait until the afternoon, and when Slater is out walking I'll bring the kitchen poker, which is a whopper."

Conrad apparently had the last sacrificed enough to friendship.

"It is no use feeling about here," he continued. "If Slater nabs me there'll be a row; and I don't want to quarrel with her to-day, for there's plum-duff for lunch, and she'll split me in my help. You keep quiet until I come back." Saying which, the heir of Orme whistled himself off, and Azalea was left to her own resources.

"I should like to kill her!" she said, with morose emphasis, but thoughts reverting to Miss Slater. "I should like to blacken her filthy blue eyes, and pull her long, thin nose!" which aspiration, if not heroic, were perhaps natural.

Seized by a sudden inspiration, she walked to the window and looked out. To her surprise she found that she overlooked the balcony of flowers that belonged to the next-door house, the fact being that the premises had formerly belonged to one owner, who had made communicating doors on the upper floor for the accommodation of a large family of children; and when Lord Orme rented his house he succeeded in persuading his fair neighbor, Lady Diana Merton, to allow him to retain, at a costly rent, the upper suit of rooms which belonged properly to herself.

The balcony was at a distance of about six feet from the nursery window, and she imagined that she would have but little difficulty in climbing over the iron partition that marked the line of separation between the balconies, if she could only succeed in getting down to their level.

She decided that it, and by way of preliminary commenced tying Topaz to her breast, swathing him in her old thin shawl, which, fortunately, had been left in her bedroom. Topaz struggled desperately in angry rebellion at this invasion of his rights of locomotion, but his mistress was firm, and as soon as she secured him she crawled on to the ledge, and let herself drop her full length on the other side. For one brief, agonized instant she thought she would give worlds to be back on the window-sill, and then she fell into the middle of some heliotropes and scarlet geraniums, and in a moment was on her feet again, a little shaken and bruised, but happy in Topaz's safety (he had given one angry astonished yelp, but was not hurt) and her own success.

She was over the iron railings and through the open window of Lord Orme's drawing-room before the owner of the balcony of flowers had recovered her surprise at the unexpected apparition which had so suddenly descended in a hollow and overturned the flower-pots. Azalea in her flying descent had unconsciously disturbed a very coy Lady-a-Bye.

Lady Diana was sitting by her window, looking lovely in a flow of pure-hued drapery and a flutter of fresh ribbons. She was revelling in the faint sweet odors the wind blew against her face, and enjoying the balm of the sunshine with a sense that the condition of a cripple was very sleepy content. On a low chair near to her sat a man, whose face was bright with the beauty of youth, and tender with its passion—a man who seemed to have little to say to the woman by his side, but who expressed volumes in the fervor with which he bent over and caressed the little hand which drooped near his own. He was lowering his lips to close upon it with a kiss, when he was interrupted, when he and his companion were awoke from the soft torpor of that pleasant moment by Azalea's unexpected appearance.

The gentleman started, swore under his breath, and blushed. The lady started a little, but did not blush. She withdrew her hand and helped her hand into the intricacies of a piece of crochet-work, and for a few minutes knitted diligently. Finding that no further invasion of her privacy was attempted, she resumed her old attitude, and did not rouse her companion from the trance of happiness in which her tender words enthralled him until she heard the clock strike one. Then, despite his pleading eyes and restraining hand, she rang a small bell, and commissioned her maid.

"Annette," she said, "please to send round to Lord Orme's, and ask the governess, with my compliments, not to let any more of the children tumble down in front of my window. Then bring my lunch. And, oh, Annette, you can show Mr. Mowbray out."

Lady Diana enjoyed her luncheon to-day. The chops were tender, the pastry light. "It melts in your mouth," she said, referring to the crust of the tart. She also thought the wine nice, with a pleasant expression of content in her face. "Boys are very nice and ingenuous," she mused; "not oh, what a bother they are! But he could have had his way every thing would have been cold. I dare say the stupid fellow never thought of my lunch. Men are so selfish when they're in love!"

She sipped some iced Moselle, and enjoyed the fresh sparkle and coolness of the wine. Then she dived her round fingers into dewy clusters of grapes, and ate them with sleepy appreciation of their delicacy. Apparently her thoughts again reverted to her lover.

"There's a bloom about them at that age" (a stranger might have imagined that she referred to the dun-coated grape she poised on her finger) "which you never see afterward. I wish he were not so fond of smiling when he says; they turn and tremble; they hope and fear; in fact, they love at one-and-twenty as they never do again. After that the poetry is gone from their hearts; all the sweet confusion is swept away like a silver mist, and they become dry, tough raisin. I much prefer them young—but then Lord Orme has thirty thousand a year."

She sighed a little, and then stood up stairs again to the drawing-room. She sat down on an easy-chair, and, taking up a large book, began to search for a name. "Conrad—"

"Here it is. 'Mowbray of Auriel, born 17—. Let me see. That makes him about sixty-five. He may have twenty years longer. Only son and heir Thurstan Mowbray, born 18—; residence, Auriel Court, Essex, etc. So Thurstan is just twenty-four, and may by no means be worth taking. Now for the Peerage. 'Baron Orme is of Orme House, Sussex; of 160 Grosvenor Square; of Kerrydale, Ireland; and Shelleston, in D—shire,' etc. That's more satisfactory, excepting that the son and heir is already provided."

She put down the book, and as she did so a page fluttered back, and she caught sight of her own name. A cloud passed over her face as she recognized the familiar entry: "Merton, the Hon. Stewart, born 18—, second son of the late Lord Clanbrassil, and wife Lady Diana Torlan, only daughter of the late Earl of Plaishire. Mr. Merton is author of the well-known 'Essex Snakes, in his passage from Calcutta to England." We had only been married a year, Lady Diana mused, when the Sea Serpent sailed, whenever she wanted to make capital of this affliction of the past. "He was going to England in six months, and I was left to go aboard at the same time of the death of my poor father-in-law and my dear husband." A few lines were written in ink under the formal record of Stewart Merton's birth and death, saying that the deceased was only thirty years of age at the time of the disastrous wreck of the Sea Serpent, that he had been seen exerting himself to the utmost to secure the lives of others, but when urged to the boats refused to leave the ship until the last steps to do so, "which was the more extraordinary as he left a young and beautiful bride inconsolable for his loss."

These were the lines at which Lady Diana's brow clouded as her eye fell on them accidentally.

"It was very strange," she murmured; "I never understood it." And she sang over several times thrilled her heart when she remembered a certain flirtation she was indulging in at the time of her husband's death; but she consoled herself with the reflection that, "as he never knew it, it couldn't hurt his feelings." That was fifteen years ago.

"If he had lived he would have been forty-five now. Ah, well, perhaps it is better as it is. He was a stern man even under the softening of the first twelve months of matrimony. I dare say he would have led me a life. There can be no doubt about it, I suppose," she continued, as she flung down the book and lounged back in the sofa. "But I have been sure, quite sure, to have put in an appearance or have been heard of before now—fifteen years—of course it's certain. It's only the pleasant people who stay away so long. Milliners' bills, country cousins, insolvent lovers, and ungreeable husbands are not to be so easily got rid of."

"Nor boy lovers either," she added, with a smile, as the flush of broken flowers brought back her visitor to her mind.

"I wonder what he is doing now; thinking of me, no doubt." So saying Lady Diana curled herself round comfortably on the sofa and fixed her gaze on a buzzing blue-bottle until the fly seemed blotting ghost of a fly, as her eyes closed in sleep.

As for Thurstan Mowbray, he was sitting on a mound of turf in the sunshine, his sunning fiercely on his head, the foam splashing to his feet, and he was whispering his heart's secret to the incoming tide, and wondering how it was the waves appeared to be so exultantly, so madly glad, and the wind so ineffably sweet; how it was that the elements seemed filled with glim, mysterious hints of happiness. In one instant he drew in all earth's gladness with his breath, and was not that life and love immortality; in another he pined to die, to sob out his last sigh on that hand whose remembered caress still thrilled his breast.

In a word, he was four-and-twenty, and in love for the first time, and so thought of any thing but his luncheon.

CHAPTER XI.

THY PEOPLE SHALL BE MY PEOPLE.

AZALEA was fortunate enough to find Conrad the only tenant of the drawing-room when she entered it through the window. His nerves received a shock at the unexpectedness of her appearance. He was stroking his nose with a ruler, and hit himself severely in his agitation. Then, with tears of pain and enthusiasm, he solemnly pronounced her to be "a brick, a first rater, and the right sort."

"I've often thought of doing it," he said, looking anxiously at the scene of the exploit, "but was afraid of Slater coming down.

When his excitement had subsided, Azalea found him a most useful friend.

"Have you any thin' in my tin?" he asked.

"Any what?" said Azalea, mystified.

"Any tin; any money. I've none for money. Dear me, you are a muff in some things, Azalea."

He lent her a sovereign of his own money on the security of a note of one pound, to be payable two days after date.

"If you were to play my tricks, now, I should quod you," he said, gravely. He examined Great's show, and told her what trains she was to catch. "I'll see you off from the station myself," he said, "and shall be down by two."

Azalea thanked him gratefully.

"I shall never forgee it," she murmured, with emotion.

"All serene," was his indifferent response, and then they started for the station. On arriving there Conrad found that many officials about in the most lordly manner, and as he was very well known from his frequent expeditions on the line to Brighton for his father, he was treated with respect and attention.

He gave Azalea directions what to do when she got to London, and one of the guards promised to see the little girl ("who was going home to see her sick governor") safely transferred to the cab which was to despatch her to the other terminus.

"Now can I thank you enough, Conrad?" the girl said, gratefully.

Conrad winked.

"Stand me a dozen woodpeckers' eggs," he whispered. "They're thought no end at school; they're awfully difficult to find down here, and consist of putting their hands in the cherry-trees, 'cause of snakes."

When Lord Orme heard of Azalea's flight he was extremely angry and mortified. True, he had several times condemned his own folly for bringing her to an atmosphere so uncongenial to her nature and education; he had sworn that between the secret love he felt toward her and his sensibility of the awkwardness of the position in which he had placed himself, he had considered a hundred schemes for placing her in such circumstances that her happiness might excuse his deception; he would cover her handsomely, although money was not more plentiful with him than it is with many other reputed possessors of thirty thousand a year; he would see that she married well; he would, in short, do any thing but what was right: it is not so easy to do right when the proceeding necessitates the confession of a long course of wrong.

As Lord Orme was driven down to Auriel to ascertain her safety and see how matters stood he felt himself strangely drawn toward Azalea. He felt more like going home as he got nearer this neglected child than he ever did when about to re-enter his own luxurious house.

The memory of a tender voice and ever-loving face made a welcome for him in Azalea's greeting of which she was totally unconscious; indeed, her heart sank with something like a qualm of fear when she heard the wheels of Lord Orme's carriage drive up to the house; but she put aside her own emotions to soothe those of her foster-father. The exquisite pain with which she had first witnessed and understood the extent of his illness had not been unmixed with remorse. She felt, if she had not deserted him, perhaps this dreadful calamity would not have fallen on him.

"I am not going to leave you, dad," she said, in quick response to the expression which troubled his eyes, when they heard the approaching carriage-wheels. "Nothing in the world could make me leave you."

The paralytic looked more satisfied; but the anxious expression recurred as Lord Orme entered the room and embraced Azalea, with evident emotion. Azalea, who had expected a scolding, hung her head, abashed.

"I was very sorry," she stammered, "to come away like that—but he was so ill, you see."

"Yes, I see," Lord Orme said, gravely.

He sat down by the sick man's side, and watched him with pity and concern; then he turned to the child and drew her toward him, Moore following the movement with jealous eye.

"I'm going to talk to you very seriously, Azalea," Lord Orme said. "I can only spend a short time here, as I must catch the next train to London; but I want to take you with me."

Azalea shook her head, but Lord Orme checked the impending refusal.

"Stop! Just listen to and then consider what I say. The doctors tell me that my little Rosa is very delicate, and that for her health's sake I must spend the winter abroad. I shall leave England next week."

Then he explained to Azalea, in simple and explicit terms, what his wishes were concerning herself. He wanted her to go abroad with him, to be educated like one of his own children; he would give her every advantage they possessed. She should be independent of Miss Slater; every pleasure that wealth could obtain should be lavished on her. She should be initiated in almost all the beauties of the strange countries she should visit; he made her see hundreds of snow-hills flushed by sunset, and hear the babble of waterfalls that rumbled down their clefted sides: he pictured grand old cities, rich with the beauty of their decay, and enumerated the wonders of perfect art. He represented to her how different would be her life should she elect to spend it with this invalid in this dull old mansion. "You will be sufficiently refined to feel pain in associating with peasants," he urged; "but if you grow up in the neighborhood no other society, it will then be too late to take your place among your equals." He promised that if she consented to leave him, the invalid should be surrounded with every comfort that money could procure. "He will be better off than he is now; he shall have the best medical attendance, and nurses to wait on him day and night."

Moore and Azalea had gone to George Moore's side and was looking at him with her violet eyes brimming over with tenderness.

"He will be very miserable, dear child," she said. "I am holding your hand tight. I shall not leave go of it." Then she looked up shyly at Lord Orme. "You are very kind," she said, "and I should like to see Conrad again and the beautiful hills of grass; but, you see, when I was ill you were so handsome; daddy took such care of me; and it wouldn't be fair to leave him now he is helpless, and I can be of use to him. I love him better than any thing in the world—indeed he is the only thing I have to love, except Topaz. I shall never leave daddy again as long as I live."

She spoke in a tone so unaffectedly sincere and firm that Lord Orme felt it would be useless to urge further persuasion. He turned his head away from her.

"She forgave me before she died," he thought, "but her child cancels the forgiveness." He then walked up to Moore.

"You see she is faithful to you," he said, bitterly. "I will not let me atone for the past. You, who can neither move nor speak, have more influence with her than I, after all my concessions. I offer her a home and her good-by forever. I could not endure to meet her in the future and see her preferring me to that, should she survive you, she will have no difficulty in drawing the money. I hope you will get better and live to enjoy many happy years. You are a richer man than I, Moore; for if I were in your state, I don't believe a single creature would care by my will whether I lived or died."

So saying, Lord Orme left the room, and was descending the broad oak stairs, when he felt a little hand glide into his own, and said:

"You didn't say good-by to me?" pleaded Azalea.

"But you have said good-by to me for good and all," Lord Orme said, with suppressed passion. Then he took her in his arms and kissed her. "Oh, child, child!" he cried, "I once knew a face like yours—but it never turned away from me as yours has done to-day!"

"Miss Zalea!" called old Sally, from the top of the stairs, "master seems mighty uneasy without you! Won't ye come back?"

Azalea disengaged herself rapidly from Lord Orme's grasp.

"Good-by; I must go to daddy," she said, hastily. "Please give this packet to Conrad."

She turned away as she spoke, and Lord Orme gave a last look at her fair head as it flashed post the oak balustrades, and then re-entered his carriage.

George Moore heard the wheels rolling away, and his eyes twinkled brightly as they fell on the little figure by his side.

"I should have been miserable without you, dad," Azalea said, interrupting herself in the middle of a little song she was singing to amuse the invalid. "Why, I'm wretched if I'm not looking at you."

The old man looked a blessing at her with his eyes, and the child sang the summery carols near his silver ones, and finished the song in low soft tones which lulled the invalid to sleep. The sweet gloom of the afternoon crowding in on them thus, and when, after a short slumber, George Moore awoke, it was to the happiness of knowing that, waking or sleeping, that little face would henceforth keep constant watch over him.

CHAPTER XII.

ROBERT DOUGLAS.

AUTUMN grew older and deepened in warmth and color: the ripe berries dropped thickly round the barberry-trees, and faint-scented ridges of clematis blossom lay on the Auriel window-sills. As the red glow faded from the earth, cold hints of winter began to blow through the warm scented blaze of color; touches of storm moaned in the restless sea, and the cry of the boughs, and the winds were full of the freshness of angry curling seas and raining clouds.

At Ardcarne the boughs, drifted leaves, and bruised fruit were the only victims to the wind's equinoctial madness, but round the rough edged coast the cries of wailing followed the track of distressed vessels and submerged boats. On the roughest of oft-trodden highways, the British Channel, the passage of a less tragic character, was scarcely less intense in degree.

On one of these restless September nights the packet from Boulogne to Folkestone only carried two passengers who were not in a state either of incipient seasickness or utter collapse. One of these exceptions was the captain of a merchant vessel, and he viewed the sufferings of his fellow-passengers with a benign contempt which would have been hard to bear had not misery made them reckless.

He was a bluff hearty man, and trod the heaving deck as gayly as if it had been a level meadow. He enjoyed his cigar, and he whistled tunes to the wind, and altogether treated the elements as old friends should be treated, with cordial ease and fondness.

He cast many a look at his vessel, full of self-possession, expecting every moment to see him prostrated as ignominiously as the other victims to the rough passage. He was even malicious enough to puff a puff of smoke in the direction of his companion's moody face, but so far from being discomposed, the latter kicked up his head and said,

"Can you give me a cigar?"

The sea-captain stared through the gloom at the tall figure before him, answering with mechanical politeness,

"With pleasure, Sir."

The stare was given to the poverty-stricken aspect of the speaker—the courtesy to his gentle high-bred voice.

"Thank you," the owner of the shabby clothes said, bowing. "One doesn't feel so hungry after smoking."

"We shall get a jolly supper at the Pavilion," the captain said, comfortably. "When I'm aboard and feel easy the empty fellow can carry away from the d—d thin dinners, I sit and plan what I'll have when I get to cozy England again. Last night I've planned to have roast mutton and butter-pudding. I dare say it's roasting now," he added, meditatively.

"That sounds very nice," the smoker said, moving away, for he was now puffing his cigar vigorously and felt disinclined for conversation; but the captain came to the end of his, and followed him up the deck.

"Isn't it jolly getting near the home lights again?" he said, pointing to some not faint yellow specks that could sometimes be seen between the cleft of the waves.

"Well, yes, particularly, I think," the smoker said, indifferently.

"Think of one's dinner, to say nothing of one's wife," the captain suggested, with his rubicund face soft with sentiment. "Perhaps you haven't got a missus?" he suggested, presently.

"I don't think so."

"Well, you are a rum 'un," laughed the seaman. "Perhaps you don't look forward to your dinner?"

"I can't say I do."

"What do you look forward to, then?"

"Nothing."

"Then why the dickens do you come—I mean, Sir—I beg pardon for being so cheeky"—checking himself; "but you quite take the wind out of my sails. I can't understand a man not knowing whether he has a wife, and not caring about English fare."

"I have been away from England a long time," the other observed.

"Ah! that makes a difference; dare say you don't know what tricks your wife's been up to. There was Bill Somers, of my crew; he was very unfortunate in his partner: went abroad six times, found her married to a Queen's man each time he came back, and the double family came very hard on him. She was a handy woman, though, hard-working and industrious; and a handy woman, whether she's married to one man or six, ain't to be sneezed at."

For a moment a gust of wind carried some other of the seaman's philosophical doctrines to leeward; then he returned again to the attack. "Are you expecting to meet any friends there?" he asked, observing that his companion was looking toward the fast-nearing shore.

"To the best of my belief I have no friend," the latter said, slowly. "There is one man in England who should be glad to remember my face; but I dare say he will fail to recognize it."

"Going on to town to-night?"

"Yes, I think so."

The boat stopped at Folkestone Pier; the seaman looked again at the disreputable hat and shabby coat.

"I've a great mind to ask him to dinner," he thought; "but he looks such a queer cadger: I'll keep the gentleman in his ways, though, and seems so lonely, too."

Feeling bashful with his good intentions, the merchantman cleared his throat and stammered,

"I say, Mr.—"

"Douglas," supplemented the stranger, quietly.

"Mr. Douglas, will you come and have a snack with me? I'm at the Pavilion, and you know what I've got to expect—roast and d—d: there'll be plenty for two."

"If you are very kind, Mr. Douglas said, pleasantly; "but, my dear Sir, there is one thing an Englishman can never forget, however prolonged his absence may have been from the land of his birth."

"And that is—"

"The impurity of the British hotel-keeper. I wouldn't for worlds be the cause of doubling your remorse when you come to pay the long bill that will be presented to you to-morrow morning, when you're in too great a hurry to catch the train to do more (or less) than curse and pay. Good-night, and many thanks for your kindness, but I was very grateful to you for that excellent cigar; it will be quite as good as a dinner to me. Good-night."

"Good-night," the seaman said, regretfully. "I'm sorry you can't come."

"Good-night, and thank you."

The man who called himself Douglas disappeared in the darkness in the direction of the railway station. He finished a comfortless meal; he got into one of the second-class carriages of the London train; and while he sits there, the lamp-light shining through the dirty glass on head and crossed hands—delicate, blue-veined hands, they are—the appearance of which contrasted oddly with the coarse material of the sleeve that circled them—let us give a few words of description to this man whom no one welcomed back to his native land after an absence of nearly fifteen years.

He was a man of some forty odd years of age, and he looked even older, for his hair was gray and his features sent, like a mirror, every cloud what harsh and strongly-marked; his eyebrows shaggy and iron-colored, like his thick, waving hair; his mouth full and sensual, the jaw massive, the eyes deep-set and thoughtful. Power dwelt in his broad, wrinkled forehead and pensive eyes—such subtle, mysterious power as one sometimes endows men with, making them royal in a kingdom where to be supreme is to be immortal.

But if the grand brow and searching gaze betokened the mind's subtle triumph over matter, the sensual mouth asserted itself in the animals. Some would have called it a sensual mouth, and imagined that the brain had found it difficult to keep its ethereal supremacy over the grosser elements hinted at by full sensual lips.

I do not wish to indicate that Robert Douglas was the slave of his senses; all his life he had been their master; but his intellect, too proud and mighty to be abused, was not in sympathy with them. He had drunk, loved, and laughed in his youth, and had reached enjoyment's sweetest and most perilous heights. Love, and fame, and fun, his refined palate, his passionate richness of emotion, had wondrously intensified the glory of youth's existence. Unhappily the capability to enjoy keenly implies the power to suffer greatly.

Robert Douglas had lived to loathe his life as much as he had once reveled in it. He had rejoiced as few men can rejoice, but he had suffered as few men have suffered. The fiery fever-period life's prime the days were no longer bright with. Hope's allurements for him; his heart might not throb with pleasure, glow with anticipation. The past was his future—not the past of his blithe youth, but the past of his manhood's prime, when life ceased to fear, and stagnant waste. He rarely smiled now, and never wept; he neither hoped nor feared; he only feared to forget. The years of suffering that had once convulsed his soul had passed away, leaving nothing but the dull ache of its memory.

I have said that he had ceased to fear, and I was wrong in so saying. He had one terror, and that was the apprehension of aught occurring that might again make the flame of pain leap in his breast. He would have dreaded equally any return of his old happiness. The very vastness and greatness of his joy had aided to break his heart, and henceforth he shrank from the scent of the roses as from the poisonous air of their decay. For sweet treachery and the sharp wound were inseparably connected.

As we gaze on him his mind was as great as his heart. An ordinary man might have succumbed to fatuous self-indulgence, might have sought compensation for his disappointments in one sense in reckless prostitution of another; but the sorrow that had dulled the one great joy of his life roused lesser pleasures to appear tasteless and insufficient.

Such was he whom the train was hurrying through the tempestuous autumn night on his road to London. He knew that no face would brighten at his approach, no outstretched hand meet his at his journey's end. The quick rain and the bleak wind, the outside of unfriendly doors—these were all that awaited him as he left the shelter of the railway terminus. On the whole, Robert Douglas felt more utterly desolate on this first night of his return to his mother country than he had ever done in solitudes where the savage jaguar lurked in dense shadows; where the cries of wild animals shrilled over a lonely but luxuriant world of tropical vegetation; where strange-faced beasts looked at him through the leaves, and the red man's shadow flitted dark against the sun.

As whatever art of story-telling I care to pursue is not of the sensational order, which delights in dead secrets and living surprises, I must say one word more of this Robert Douglas before I proceed. Perhaps the reader has already guessed who he is: I think I can guess it soon; and in any case, I do not affect to conceal that he is Lady Diana's husband, supposed to be drowned —Stuart Merton.

CHAPTER XIII.

SHE IS FOOLING HIM.

LADY DIANA MERTON never looked more attractive than when attired for riding. Her warmhued hair was massed in compact and glistening folds high at the back of her shapely head. The throat underneath was fair and round; delicately-tinted rose glowed through the dark shadow of the riding veil, and the smooth, close-fitting cloth habit showed the full, lithe outline of her figure to perfection. On the morning succeeding the stormy night we have described, she was standing in her little drawing-room in London awaiting the coming of her horses. She had been waiting some little time, for her grooms were insolent and ill-paid, but it never irked Lady Diana. She was in a place where there were mirrors; and for the last few minutes she had revealed in the self-content with which the reflection of her beauty inspired her. Captain Mowbray was presently announced, and the lady greeted him with a tender clasp of her newly-gloved little hand.

"How nice you look!" he said, simply.

"How very inadequately he expresses it!" Lady Diana said to herself, with a covert glance at the mirror.

Thurstan bent his handsome head low near the lady's cheek.

"Did you hear the storm last night?" he murmured.

"No," she answered, unsuspiciously; "I slept very well."

"Not I," he said, reproachfully. "I never do sleep now."

She looked up at him with her gray eyes sparkling. "Poor gentlemen in the army are not celebrated for keeping good hours," she observed, sententiously.

"It is not that," he said, with agitation; "it is—"

But what it was must remain a secret in Captain Mowbray's troubled mind for the present, for a servant opened the door and announced the horses. Lady Diana followed quickly down the stairs.

"I'm glad he didn't say too much," she thought, as she looked down with a sweet smile on Captain Mowbray's somewhat lingering endeavors to arrange her little foot in the stirrup. "When they ask me to marry, it's all up with me. It brings things to an unsatisfactory conclusion; for I am obliged to say no, and then they find me out."

Thurstan Mowbray did not gain another opportunity to-day of saying more than a few words to Lady Diana. She was joined by a lady friend immediately after, and the three cantered abreast under the pleasant shade of the Row, Thurstan riding only just behind the ladies, for his mistress. Town was nearly empty—that is to say, in a fashionable point of view—and Captain Mowbray thought it a little cruelty of the gayly-dressed country women, where gray partridges were falling like hail under the aim of one or two of his friends, and who were fortunate enough to own good shooting quarters. "Denzil asked me down to his father's to shoot," he observed presently to Lady Diana, who was always quick to detect and condemn any one's selfishness but her own, said, scornfully,

"And you didn't go, I suppose, to me?"

"You know why," he stammered; "you know that I can only get a few days' leave now and then, and I wanted to spend those days where you are, and—"

"It was too short a time to make it worth while to go to your friend's?" Lady Diana suggested, dryly.

"Not at all. I might have got two clear days' shooting at Denzil's place, and I am a good shot, though you mayn't think it; and I do wish you would go, my dear, for a little change," Thurstan spoke on, "Captain Mowbray said, in an injured tone.

"I had staying at other people's houses," pawned Lady Diana. "One never gets one's comforts attended to. It has taken years to educate my maid's household to my wishes. I am old enough not to like being crossed in my little requirements. I like to be sure that my tea is good, my tea strong, my bed a mattress, and my letters certain to go to the post. On those points one is always helpless, and generally ends in a total disappointment."

"I wonder if I could make you happy in a house of mine?" Captain Mowbray murmured, edging nearer to her side.

Lady Diana's mare balked out at this moment, and Captain Mowbray's horse prudently sidled away.

"I think it was a fly," the lady said, innocently; and the three cantered on the faster from the temporary excitement of the horses.

"Confound the fly," Thurstan muttered, moreover, as he rode with a cloud on his brow. He had been baffled several times lately in his efforts to make Lady Diana understand his sentiments: in his ignorance he was not aware how little so practiced a coquette required any such enlightenment; and the struggle between the eloquence of his feelings and his difficulty in expressing them frequently made sore confusion in his mind.

"He looks handsomest when he's sulky," Lady Diana thought as she noted Captain Mowbray's air of depression. "It is a pity one is too tenderhearted to keep him so. Men who are in love look such fools when they're pleased."

Thurstan was not in love, as Lady Diana's dear by this time; she looked with satisfaction at her lover as he swung himself lightly off his horse.

"Such a perfect figure!" she murmured to herself. Captain Mowbray, you can not drink tea with me to-day. I expect my aunt." (Oh, Lady Diana!) "—She's a Quaker, and has an abhorrence of dragoons. Good-by, and—" the rest of the sentence reached only his ear as her figure swayed forward into his arms and he lifted her to the ground. He looked at her, his face flushed with pleasure.

"You make me so happy!" he stammered, under his breath. Lady Diana smiled a divine smile of pity and tenderness, and felt herself to be performing with the nice skill of human kindness.

There was a witness to this little scene which no one took any notice, but nevertheless he appeared to be much interested in the group assembled round Lady Diana's door. This was a man who leaned against the area railings, and looked at the lady as she dismounted with a gaze so fixed, intense and searching that she noticed it even in all the flutter of gratified vanity. It was her own husband, and she knew him not.

"What do you want?" she said, pausing on the steps and gathering up her skirts that they might not come in contact with the man's coarse-looking garments.

"Nothing," he answered, shortly, and turned away.

"Mad! poor creature," Lady Diana said, compassionately, watching the tall ill-clad figure as it disappeared down a by-street. Then she went on slowly to prepare herself for a new visitor—not a Quaker aunt, but a dignitary of the Church.

"I am never yet seen a spooney bishop," she said, meditatively, as she put on a fresh muslin robe, and fastened starry blossoms of Cape jasmine in her hair, and in the bright folds of her hair. "I wonder what his lordship will think of me, and if he will find his knowledge of the Thirty-nine Articles of any use to him?"

LITTLE MAY.

Oh! empty is her little bed
And useless stands my darling's chair,
That sunny face, that golden head,
Shall never more be seen there!

Oh! silent is the little room
Where once her childish voice was heard;
No sunlight ever breaks the gloom;
The blinds are never stirred.

For little May, fair as the light,
Fresh as the flowers that bloom and die,
Is singing with the angels bright,
In lands beyond the sky.

JOHN BULL AS A BARKING DOG.

THE English correspondent of the New York Tribune, May 30, writes:

"In the Charing Cross railway station, and on the approaches kept by a Belgian establishment, may be seen to-day an exhibition of fine arts considerably more interesting, for the moment, than any of the crowded galleries in Piccadilly or Pall Mall. A series of four cartoons is displayed, the authors of which have done us the honor to select America for the subject of their illustrations. The four cartoons are published in four different papers by courtesy called comic; and, whatever may be the merit of them as an artistic point of view, they illustrate very well the popular feeling about the American claims.

On page 397 we give copies of the four cartoons referred to by the Tribune correspondent. As they illustrate a pleasant phase of John Bull's character, it will be scarcely fair to withhold them from our readers.

AN ELEPHANT NURSE.

We have seen the elephant engaged in many occupations that would seem to require a quality of instant humanity upon mere—such, for example, as laying water-pipes of great weight in their respective trenches with wonderful precision, lifting great over bad roads, and punishing their brother elephants, when directed by the mahouts or drivers, by thrashing them with a heavy chain made for the purpose—with trunks effect by their long trunks. But the scene depicted on page 396 shows it in a character which will be novel to most of our readers. The sketch was taken at a halting-ground on the high-road to Candahar, where a party of merchants, with their families, had encamped for the night. The wives, engaged in preparing the evening meal, had confided their offspring to the care of one of the huge quadrupeds of the party, and it was curious and interesting to observe the anxiety of the brute to perform the office intrusted to it conscientiously. Two of the babies, more nimble than the others, caused it great anxiety, for they were constantly trying to crawl beyond the limits of the chain tether, and more than once had nearly succeeded; but the watchfulness of the nurse was soon to be equal, and with the utmost gentleness it would lift its tender charges with its huge proboscis slowly within the limits assigned for.

An elephant has just been imported by Mr. J. M. FRENCH, which is the largest specimen ever seen in this country. It was presented by the Russian Emperor to Mr. ROSENBACH, and was brought here by Mr. CHARLES RICE, of London. She is 11 feet 6 inches high, weighs 12,000 pounds, and is 30 years old. She is represented as being kind and docile.

THE ILLEGAL MARRIAGE;

OR,

CECY MORGAN'S TRIAL.

BY HON. EVELYN ASHBY.

[NOTE.—Thousands of our readers, residents of Central Georgia, will thank us for placing before them an accurate narrative of the Echaconnee Tragedy. When this case was under judicial investigation, as the residents of Bibb County are well aware, it was surrounded by a halo of mystery which the most experienced detectives failed to penetrate or dispel; and although the person accused of the murder was released for want of sufficient evidence to convict, to this day many Georgians doubt the innocence of the suspected party. Fortunately, the mystery which occasioned these doubts is now explained, and the narrative will be perused with interest, not only by Georgians, but by the public generally; for, although a record of real life, it possesses all the elements of a romance.—ED.]

CHAPTER I.

THE ECHACONNEE TRAGEDY.

About the middle of autumn one can find few climates more agreeable than that of the middle counties of Georgia and Alabama. During the day the air is warm and pleasant—a soft purplish haze hangs over the landscape—and the evenings are superb.

Italy can boast of more gorgeous sunsets than those of the Georgian middle counties. The twilight is long, and blends slowly with the moonlight, which is softer and shady sult, and sets out the dark plane la bold relief.

Near the swamps which border upon some creek there is a peculiar and indescribable charm in these moonlight evenings. The senses seem steeped in the perfume of roses and magnolias, while from the dark woods come the songs of the mocking-bird, as weird and varied as those of the European nightingale.

But here, as elsewhere, Nature has various moods. Sometimes the sun goes down in blood-red disk behind a veil of haze, in which, an hour later, the sombre crescent moon is seen above the pines. The air is heavy and oppressive; while the wild songs of the mocking-bird are exchanged for the piping of frogs and the plaintive notes of the whippoorwill.

This state of the atmosphere is particularly observed along the Echaconnee—a stream bordered with dank, heavy swamps, home of the alligator and deadly moccasin—which runs through and forms a part of the dividing line between the counties of Bibb, Crawford, and Houston. At such times a presentiment of trouble—a nameless dread—is weighing ill—seems to pervade the atmosphere, having a wonderfully depressing effect upon the mind.

On a night like this, some few years ago, Mr. William Stannard—a man of five and thirty, and a large planter in the County of Houston—sat on the veranda of his house, slowly puffing his Havana in the shade of a large magnolia. Very quiet he sat, moving only now and then when he indolently took the cigar from his mouth and blew out a long cloud of smoke.

Perhaps Mr. or Colonel Stannard was not a "very handsome man," yet there was something very striking in his appearance. Tall and slight as he first appeared, it was muscular and compact, while his shoulders seemed to grow in breadth upon you. Great muscular power was concealed beneath the lazy grace of his manner.

His hazel eyes were placid and kindly, his brown moustache and imperial filled all defects of outline, and his hand was small and white enough for a lady. Sitting there under his own vine and fig-tree, he looked exactly what he was—a man of travel and of culture—a wealthy planter—a man satisfied with himself and the world.

But on this night his mind was unusually depressed. A mist was gathering over the valley, and as his eyes turned toward the belt of woods marking the Echaconnee he, too had his half-discovered view moving slowly drooping behind the pines. The stars were hidden, and in the dim light the fire on his cigar threw fitful circles about his face.

Presently the cigar was forgotten, and fancy carried away his soul. A vision had come to him—a vision of the sweet girl, loved. Cecilia Morgan! Beautiful Cecy Morgan! Why had she come to haunt him when nearly overpowered in his struggle to forget her? He had given her up to another! Why was he not reconciled to the thought of her being Alfred Gourry's wife? No: it was useless to deceive himself—he loved her still. It was madness to think of her.

At that very moment was another in agony of doubt and fear. At that moment Cecy Morgan was kneeling beside her bed, in the cold house beyond the creek, clutching the coverlet in her hand, and—thinking of him. But, just parted with her betrothed, she had come to pray away her doubts. She wished to love Alfred Gourry, who had promised to be his wife; but she knew that she loved another. Stannard could not love her, she thought, and she would make Alfred a good wife.

Still Stannard wondered at his depression, but at length rose from his chair. "Pshaw!" he muttered, "why should I bother my head with thinking. It does me no good. Sir Philip Sidney was right when he said, 'Reason can not show itself more reasonable than to leave reasoning on things above reason.'"

The air grew damp and heavy. A southerly wind was rising, which, sighing through the trees, made the night still more uncomfortable. Throwing away his cigar after one long puff, he paused to watch the parabola of light until it ended in a bed of garden violets, and shone like a glow-worm among the leaves.

He retired, but only to find his slumber broken and uneasy. A sense of impending ill hung heavy on his mind. Throughout the long night, it seemed to him, he was rolling and tossing about, but near morning he was suddenly roused with a vague consciousness that somebody was calling him.

That it was not a dream he soon learned, for he sprang out of bed at the heard a sharp "hallos" at the gate, and a quick "rat-tat-tat" upon it with a stick.

Throwing up the window, he saw through the darkness of the morning the dim outline of a man on horseback.

"What is it?" he called quickly.

"Please go up to Echaconnee, sir. The old man is—"

A gust of wind slammed the blind in his face, and he barely caught the word "doctor," as the horseman disappeared.

"That was Morgan's man," he mused, hurriedly throwing on his clothes: "it was Ogletree's voice—I wonder what is wrong on the hill."

In less than half an hour he was galloping down the road. Passing the last patch of woods, his horse shied, and, on looking around, he caught a mere glimpse of the man sticking down behind a fallen tree. In a second the names of Alfred Gourry and old Abner Hawks came into his mind. Was it really they, and at such an hour, in such a place? He turned his horse quickly into the wood, but saw no one. It was daybreak, but still dark and stormy, when he arrived at Morgan's house. Half a dozen hounds answered his call, and amid their noise a negro spoke.

"What's the matter?" Stannard asked quickly.

The yelp of the dogs prevented him hearing the reply. Two negro men were by the door, but too terrified to speak. Stannard pushed open the door to the left, and entered a small room. It was empty.

Lying upon the bed shouting or talking incoherently, and wildly swinging his arms about, was old Morgan, the ruddy face covered with blood, his hands gashed and bleeding.

With a quick glance Stannard took in the details of his room, observing many signs of a struggle. One window was broken, the chairs were in confusion, the inner door hung by one hinge, while spots of blood were plentiful about the floor.

Squatted in the corners were the house-servants, wailing loudly; and at the foot of the bed kneeled the old man's daughter, Cecilia—a girl of one and twenty, and of uncommon beauty.

Stannard was shocked at her appearance. She did not seem to recognize him.

"Oh, Cecy! for Heaven's sake tell me—tell me, Cecy —who has—has—"

He could not finish, for she bowed her head on his words. Seeing the terrified condition of all, he caught one of the old man's hands.

"Why, Morgan," he said, holding firmly upon the hand, "what is the matter? Be quiet, won't you?"

At the sound of his voice Morgan ceased struggling, and turned his head a little on one side, as if trying to catch the tone again.

"Don't you know me, Morgan? Speak to me. Look up a little."

Slowly the wounded man opened his eyes, but it was some time before he seemed to be conscious. Stannard spoke again:

"My dear old friend! Do look at me a minute. Don't you know me?"

The veil eyes turned full upon him now, and a look of recognition was apparent. With a few convulsive pushes Morgan bared his breast, displaying a mass of bloody wounds.

"See, boy—see, my boy—"

He gargled out the words, and looked at Stannard, who started back at the horrid sight.

"Good Heaven, Morgan! who has done this? Who could have done it?"

Grasping his throat with one hand, and gasping for breath, the old man pointed to his daughter.

"She—my boy—she—"

A cry of blood choked him for a moment, and Stannard's eyes followed the gaunt finger. Miss Morgan watched intently.

"Cecy, you know. Ike been—my—death," the old man, with great difficulty.

With a wail of despair, Miss Morgan fell to the floor, and, turning to her side, pushed away against Doctor Tripps, who was just entering, after being a short witness to this painful scene.

"Ogletree, you know. Ike—"

Another flood choked him for a moment, and Stannard's eyes followed the gaunt finger. Miss Morgan watched intently.

"A bad business," said Tripps, who was examining the wounds.

"Horrible! horrible!" Stannard replied, throwing himself upon a lounge. In a semi-comatose state he oughowed the physician and the unmoved the wounds. At length Tripps turned from his work.

"A sad case, Stannard," he said, stroking his beard; "but I found it'll long case."

"It is sad, doctor, but I can not believe it."

"Believe what, Stannard?" Tripps asked.

"You know what I mean and? I can never believe she—that Miss Morgan—"

The sentence was not completed, for Stannard sprang to his feet, and hobbled about the floor. Tripps watched also, and there, before them, looking like a ghost or a marble statue, stood Cecilia Morgan, accused of murder.

CHAPTER II.

With open eyes, which seemed to look through them rather than at them, and the steady gaze of a somnambulist, Miss Morgan turned to the doctor, and gently passed her hand across her forehead.

"Will he die, doctor? will he die? Oh, doctor, please tell me!"

"My dear Miss Morgan, this is no place for you now; come, let me help you back."

"No, doctor, you need not touch to know, for I have a particular—a particular—"

Once more she paused her hand slowly across her brow, a gesture that was inexpressibly painful to the men before her.

"Doctor," she continued, "do tell me: I've a very particular reason for wishing to know the truth."

"Poor girl" said Trippe, in an undertone: "the shock has been too much for her. Her mind is wandering."

They took her gently by the arms, and, half supporting her, walked toward the door; but she saw the body, covered over with the sheet, and knew the worst. With a touching cry, she sank unconscious at their feet.

Once more Stannard carried her out in his arms, and, leaving the doctor by her side, ran for water. Crowding about the doors were the plantation negroes, uttering their peculiar wail—as terrible as that of the Greek weepers—while down on the hearth, almost in the ashes, the house-girl crouched like a frightened hare.

It was with difficulty that the water was obtained; but, snatching the bowl from a mammy's hand, he ran back to Miss Morgan's side. He was about to sprinkle her face, when Trippe checked him.

"Never mind that now, she's reviving a little. Come here; I want to—to—" Trippe started on, Stannard following, and passed by Morgan's body.

"I want to explain to you," Trippe begun, "that—that—"

Ogletree, the overseer, interrupted the explanation.

"I came in to see if I could help you any."

"I don't know about that, Ogletree; not just now. Have you sent for any one?"

"I saw one of Carrol's boys, and told him there's been an accident at our house. I didn't like to tell him the truth."

"You are right. On second thought you may send for Simmons. He'll have to hold an inquest; and you might—"

A noise at the gate interrupted the doctor's remark. Stannard rushed to the window.

"I believe Raborn is here, Trippe. Yes, here comes Carrol, too. Bad news travels fast in the country, doctor. I don't think you'll have to send for any one."

"Perhaps not," Trippe answered, thoughtfully. "On the whole, Ogletree, you may go for Simmons. Ask him to stop at my house when he comes by."

Ogletree went out, showing in the newcomers. Stannard joined them in the dining-room. Suddenly Trippe broke in upon his story.

"Carrol, do you know if Simmons is at home?"

"I believe so, doctor: he was yesterday. One of his boys was sick at my place, and when he went home this morning he seen you riding by at the crack of day. I suspicioned that Morgan was sick, so rid over, and—"

Trippe turned his back to cut short the story. Stannard was again beginning to tell all he knew, when the doctor called him aside.

"I forgot to give you a word of caution, Stannard. There's no curbing gossip, you know, so we must say nothing about the—the—and toward Miss Morgan's chance completed the remark.

"Certainly not, doctor—by no means."

"I only forced the unfinished remark which a word might prevent."

The neighbors came in rapidly, the women taking possession of the house. Leaving the first to repeat the story, Stannard went to the fatal room and sat by the fire. Despite the hard character Morgan had borne, he was deeply moved by all. He had seen a second father to Stannard. Presently Trippe touched his shoulder.

"I'm obliged to go home for a time, Stannard; you can stay?"

"Yes—that is, I'll ride home and come back."

"Don't be long, Stannard—we must see to Miss Morgan, you know."

"Of course, of course," Stannard answered, absently. "She's better, doctor?" Trippe continued: "keep the negroes quiet and we'll fix it all right."

"Yes, we'll fix it—all right: all right!"

Trippe said at Stannard's abstracted manner.

"I believe he is wandering, too," Trippe said to himself, as he crossed to the group of men.

"I'll see Simmons when he comes by," he began abruptly, "and we'll fix the inquest at two o'clock."

"Suppose you make it twelve o'clock, if it's all the same to you," Ogletree replied, fire.

"Very good; say twelve, then. I said two because I wanted to take a bit of sleep meanwhile; but no matter."

"Is the settlement unhealthy, doctor?"

"By no means, Carrol; on the contrary, it is uncommonly healthy. I was up with Roper's wife—she has a fine boy."

"Thus it is," mused Stannard, as he sat with folded arms by the smouldering fire. "Thus it is that the young come on the stage and the old step from it. Who can tell the future of this young actor, whose crying is the announcement?"

His reverie was broken by hearing Trippe mount his horse. He run out in time to see the doctor's thoroughbred gallop gracefully over spirited bounds, then strike away in a swinging gallop.

"That horse is too wild for a doctor—even a heavyweight like Trippe," he said, mounting his own filly and starting after his friend.

Down the hill, along the muddy bottom, across the bit of cordurory road over the bridge, he slowly rode, checking his horse still more as he came to the bridge itself.

"The creek must be rising," he thought, as he noticed the little pools around the cypress roots; and, turning his horse to the right as he came to the stream, he almost backed over to see how high the water had already risen.

As he did so, he started back with horror; for down there, some few feet below, was his foot in the water and his body lying across a cottonwood log—was Doctor Trippe.

In spring down, to raise the wounded head, to find the heart throbbing feebly, was the work of a moment. Then he turned his horse's bridle away. Pulling the body from the creek, Stannard wrapped his own cloak about it, then rode back for help.

Just as he reached the gate, negroes and blacks were hurrying down the road. They sprang from the bridge, and again Stannard bent over the body. The men gathered around in silence and awe.

"I found him so," said Stannard, pointing; "his feet in the water—his head down upon that knot."

"There's no signs of a fight here—his horse must have shied and pitched him off."

"Probably you are right, Barton. Wonder what could have started him there?"

"Are there any nothing. The devil's in that beast, my how. Aiken, that, here! me tell the doctor on'y t'other day that that horse 'nd be the death of him. Don't you remember what I said, Ira?"

"Yes: you said you knew him of old, and—"

"Told him about the brute's throwing a man in Macon, killin' 'im's dead's a—door nail."

"Broke his neck short off," muttered Aiken in reverse.

"Come, come, boys—bear a hand, now," said Stannard. "Let's get the doctor to my house. You must say nothing of this, for I'll run send back blankets."

They raised the heavy body above the rail, the unconscious head rolling from side to side.

"Easy with him, boys—easy," said Stannard, as Trippe's head struck the rail. "Take care there, Aiken, that's a nice fence are you doing?" he continued, in no gentle tone.

Just then a negro stripped off his own coat and tore it to shreds, who was shaking with cold.

"No, no, Aleck, keep your coat."

"I do take it, Mars' William. I kin strike de cold fetter'n you kin."

The boy's earnest face touched him. Stannard was ever conscious of the feelings of the negroes, and a kind master. He saw a refusal would be misunderstood, took the coat, and rode quickly home. In a moment a boy was riding back with blankets, one pair being for the black shoulders of Aleck.

It was easier work with strong hands for a little, and in a short time Trippe was lying in bed. They poured a few spoonfuls of brandy down his throat, and but the satisfaction of finding that his heart beat all the stronger for the the stimulant.

"Will the doctor recover ourselves, presently," Stannard said, "but first let me think about getting a doctor. His wife must be sent for, too. Barton, where can we find him?"

"Mason's nigher; but the train has just gone up. You must catch the down train for Fort Valley."

"That's true. Barely time for it, though," he answered, looking at his watch. "I'll send for Doctor Flores."

Hastily writing the notes, two boys were sent off on three steeds.

Breakfast was ordered, and the negroes sent to the kitchen.

Aleck lingered behind the rest.

"Well?" Stannard interrogated.

"Here's your blankets, marster," the boy said, extending them.

For the first time Stannard remembered that he were the boy's property, and promptly said:

"Thank you, Aleck; you did me a service."

Aleck took the gift, and still held out the blankets.

"Keep them—keep them, Aleck. You shall have them for being so thoughtful and kind. You see one of your masters is dying so, Aleck."

A look of pride passed over the boy's face, but he loquened it by reluctantly. Stannard read him in thought, and stood stroking his moustache when the boy again spoke.

"Mars' William, I'd rather you wouldn't give 'em to me for that."

"Why, Aleck; why not? You earned them fairly. Remember that one never loses by being kind to others."

"I want to be that, Marster, without loses of gains."

Stannard looked up in surprise.

"My boy," he said kindly, "you rebuke me justly, and I beg your pardon for uttering an unworthy sentiment. Take the blankets, Aleck, for no reason you have given me; and if ever you need a friend, come to me."

Puzzled a little, and a good deal alarmed at his own boldness, Aleck went out quickly.

"Who would have thought that he was such a gentle?" Stannard said to himself. "He surprised me, really. He has shown me how true is the saying that nobleness of soul may often be found with an uncomely body. There's real stuff in that boy—pity there not more of it in those men of higher position."

He looked at them scornfully, but still went in to them.

"You must make yourselves at home, and call for what you want. I can not stay with you, but will send you at the earliest. Excuse me, please."

Stannard went into the room where Trippe was lying, and soon fell into a reverie over these sudden events. He was aroused at length by a woman's shriek, and turned to see the doctor's wife throw herself upon the insensible body of her husband.

Bad news does travel fast in the country. It was some time before Stannard could get Mrs. Trippe calm enough to hear the story.

"What do you think of him, Colonel Stannard? Do you—don't you think he'll die?" The poor wife could barely sob out the words.

"I hope not; indeed, I hope not" Stannard said, warmly. "Keep up heart, my dear madam. Doctor Dr. Ham. Pierce will be here in an hour or two—"

"Not sooner?"

"He could hardly get here before the train—it will not be long now."

"Who could have injured him?" she again sobbed, kissing the limp hand in her own. "Who could have injured him? It is not an accident, but him—"

"It may have been an accident, you know. We must not judge too hastily," he said, with an attempt at consolation; "but let us pray that he may, and saw no one. I thought I saw old Hawks this morning, but—"

"Old Abner Hawks?" asked Mrs. Trippe, energly.

"Yes, I thought I did; but it was a mistake.—"

"It was he," said Mrs. Stannard, in a voice that she could wretch. He has a grudge against my husband, I don't know why, and has threatened him. The doctor always laughed at it."

"But I was mistaken in—"

"Oh! I am sure, Colonel Stannard—very sure. This is the work of old Abner Hawks. And Mr. Morgan? Have you thought of that, also?"

"Heavens!" thought Stannard, as this new revelation burst upon his mind; "Heavens! can old Hawks have murdered the two? I did not think of this connection! And Alfred Gourry?"

They were quickly made think of this connection! And Alfred Gourry?"

They were quickly made think of this connection!

HITCHCOCK'S
DIME MUSIC.

IN presenting to a generous and appreciative public this new series, we feel that we are more fully meeting the popular demand for what most suits at a low price.

The properly compensate Authors, and thereby to stimulate native talent, is a cardinal feature of our undertaking; while to place upon the Piano rich gems, requiring more space than the half-Dime Series affords, induces the inauguration of the Dime Series, which it is believed will accomplish both of these aims.

The abundant success which has crowned the advent of the Half-Dime Series removes any hesitancy we might have felt in placing this new series before the public. Both will be published weekly, and the numbers multiplied rapidly as possible. Parents can rest assured that, in future as in past, our publications will be scrupulously free from any thing that has an immoral or hurtful tendency, so that those who subscribe for the numbers as issued will find nothing to offend even the most fastidious taste. The following are

WEBB'S ADDER.

The Only Practical Adding Machine in the World.

This little machine has won more popularity than any other invention of the day. It gives instantaneous additions where numbers are called off, which makes it invaluable to the bank teller, book-keeper, clerk, gauger, weigher, or measurer. It carries up the columns of a ledger account with mechanical accuracy. It has passed into very general use, and has the endorsement of all who have seen or employed it.

"No accountant need fear that he will be hit by buying it."—HENRY WARD BEECHER. "So accurate and expeditious that I have had it introduced into the various city departments."—A. OAKEY HALL, Mayor of New York. "I relieves the mind entirely, and renders Arithmetic to a simple motion of the hand."—S. C. THOMPSON, President First National Bank, No. 140 Broadway.

The machine is guaranteed to do every thing claimed for it. Price, $6, $8, and $10. To those likely to keep a machine in constant use, the $8 or $10 machine is recommended. Sent by mail on receipt of price and postage (75 cents), or by express, C. O. D., at the customer's expense. To remit saves return-money charge. Send Money Order, Registered Letter, or Draft. FORT WILLIAM HENRY HOTEL.—LAKE GEORGE.

This hotel was purchased in August last by T. Roessle & Son, the many years proprietors of the Delavan House, Albany, N.Y.

At the close of the season they began to rebuild it, and make extensive additions and alterations. They have more than doubled its size, now having accommodations for three hundred guests. They have introduced all modern improvements—Gas, Bells, Water, &c. The hotel has been entirely refitted and refurnished. The hotel opened for guests on the 8th day of June. Over two hundred persons have taken rooms for the summer, and every thing denotes that this will be the most fashionable season Lake George has known.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1869, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

ANNUAL REGATTA OF THE NEW YORK YACHT CLUB.

THE annual regatta of the New York Yacht Club came off on the 10th of June. The weather was unfavorable for those interested in the race as well as for the spectators. But there was a good wind, and from the right quarter. And what more does a yachtman desire than a favoring breeze? The spectators, however, look upon the matter from a different point of view; and for them it is not at all pleasant to be compelled to remain in a close cabin. And when the fleet is beyond the bar there is added the additional and disgusting horror of sea-sickness.

Our illustration on this page shows the lady spectators on the Middletown with members of the Yacht Club. "A band of music," says the Tribune correspondent, "charmed her listening passengers; long tables spread with china, waiters dodging about the passages, and baskets of Champagne heaped in the corners, all hinted at the luxurious gratification of another sense; and the rude, cold wind and [illegible]ling rain did not apparently dash the spirits [illegible]ven the tenderest of the curled darlings of [illegible]on that thronged the upper saloons."

The Idler and the Wh[illegible] were the winners in the race. The yacht [illegible], of the Atlantic Club, was capsized, but [illegible] on board were rescued.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

LORD CAIRNS, the leader of the Tories in the English House of Peers, is a man of great ability. He is not a dull and blind Conservative mastiff; and when he proposes to throw down the glove to the House of Commons he sees, of course, the consequences, and must be supposed to have weighed the risk. If the Lords should persist, the risk is evident enough; it is a conflict between the Peers and Commons, in which, equally of course, the Peers will be defeated, and in which also the fate of the monarchy itself would be involved.

There is probably no sagacious thinker in England who does not believe that the House of Lords is doomed. It continues upon sufferance, and upon condition of its merely ceremonial character. In the present political condition of England, amidst the radical democratic changes which are occurring there, the House of Lords is an anomaly, and is fast becoming, in the general apprehension, an absurdity. The government of England is really a popular government, except that the suffrage is not what more restricted than with us. The restriction, however, is constantly loosened. The House of Commons is elected by this general, although not universal, suffrage. The Ministry is a committee of the leaders of the majority of the House, and of Peers who are in political sympathy with the majority. This Ministry is practically the Government, and is immediately responsible to Parliament, so that if any important proposition of the Ministry fails to receive the support of the House, the members resign, and a new selection is made of persons who can count upon such support. The Crown has, theoretically, a veto. But it has not been exercised for much more than a century, and its attempted exercise would endanger the throne. The House of Lords is a concurrent chamber; but upon any vital measure, if it should presume to defy the will of the Commons, with the majority of the voters behind them, the consequence would be incalculable.

In 1832, when the part of England was not upon the passage of the Reform bill, the Lords undertook to resist. Earl Grey was Prime Minister, and he loved his order; but he was sincerely interested in the reform, and, in the instance, the King would have "swamped the Peers," as it was called—that is, he would have created Peers enough to make a majority for reform, if the Lords had not yielded. That was the last struggle between the Houses. Since then the House of Lords has been a dull, decorous assembly, whose resources have been about as influential as those of Mr. Toots. The best Liberals in England, who wish for no rupture, no violent change, but that events may proceed as smoothly as rapidly, foreseeing the necessary fall of the Peers, have lately proposed a system of life-peerages. To this the Lords have strongly assented. But the effort seems to have occasioned a reaction toward the assertion of ancient privilege; and the mere possibility of the course suggested by Lord Cairns has produced the utmost excitement.

Indeed, the proposition alone has been sufficient to overturn a very general expression of opinion upon the position of the House of Lords under the Constitution, and of its relation to the sense of the English people; and the universality and unanimity of this expression shows how entirely the institution has lost its hold. Even the Times says—a paper which says nothing that it does not believe to be the general solid opinion of the country—"The result of the struggle is not doubtful.....The only question is, whether the power they have they possess is to be proved non-existent, but whether the power which they can exercise will not be so irrevocably broken as to vanish out of existence." The Liberal papers use stronger language, which, however, does not reveal any stronger conviction of the necessary issue of the contest. The News says that the House of Lords stands outside the present system of government. The Star says that it is an obsolete thing, an undisguised anachronism. The Telegraph, with indicrous explosion, says of the popular wrath that would explode in case of such action by the Lords that "the country has spoken unmistakably and loudly. If forced to speak again its accents will no longer be free from indignation or preserve the mood of calm reason."

On the day following Lord Cairns's proposition in the caucus of the Lords, the Earl of Harrowby gave notice of a motion to postpone the reading of the Disestablishment bill for six months. This looks as if the matter were to be seriously pressed; and Lord Derby, the late Tory leader and Prime Minister, at the Informal meeting seriously urged the rejection of the bill. It would seem that the Lords can not be so dull as to invite a struggle in which they must inevitably be worsted, if experience had not shown how utterly stupid an aristocracy is. It is only within a few months that the voters of England were asked whether they wished the disestablishment of the Irish Church. The subject was thoroughly discussed by them, and by a tremendous majority they said they did. They sent up to Parliament more than a hundred and twenty majority for the disestablishment. Their will is plain; and now a club of rich old gentlemen have a fancy to thwart the popular will. M' luds, it was at Taunton that Mrs. Partington valiantly attempted to mop up the Atlantic Ocean.

THE MAYOR'S MESSAGE.

THE various thrusts at State legislation contained in the Message sent to the Common Council on the 8th of June by the Mayor of New York deserve to be met by a full answer with those tax eaters who would have no check applied to expenditure, and none upon local misgovernment.

Its speaks of "legislative legerdemain," and of "the recklessly partisan or ignorant influences which were brought to bear against city authorities by rural legislators." But the majority of the Message is best determined by the question which the Mayor submits to his constituents: "Has not too much regard been paid to the claims of individuals, and to those of some rich men who have cared more to amass family wealth than to invite metropolitan grandeur?"

The offense of the Legislature consists in the creation of the Board of Health, of the Croton Board, of the Police Commissioners, in exempting from our city's levy of taxes a very large amount which the city government would otherwise have handled, and, though not named, in the establishment of the commission which controls Central Park on a basis of independence of the local city government. The officers of "the various State commissions which are scattered throughout the city," the Mayor says, "are allowed to receive their appropriations in an aggregate amount, and to discretionally spend it in detail, entirely exempting them as dog-in-the-manger legislation that yearly afflicts the local government."

That the Message is wholly in the interest of the tax eaters against the tax payers, and that of misgovernment instead of good government, will readily appear from the contrast which the acts of the various commissions present with those of the local boards and officials.

We can point with just pride to Central Park for good management. No complaint is made of corruption there, no waste of expenditure, and every citizen feels, what can not be said of other expenditures, that there is something to show for it. The Park is not only kept with good judgment but with refined taste, and it is kept in very high order, and under the most perfect control. Imagine what would be the situation if it were given up to those who manage the Battery, Tompkins Square, or the City Hall Park. The grass on the small plots in Union and Madison squares, instead of being closely cut, was allowed the season to become suitable for hay, and was cut only a few days since, doubtless as part of the policy which neglects every thing that it can entrust to officials down to the lowest grade. The sale of the grass for private benefit constituted the motive for not gratifying the public taste with grounds in high order.

As to the Board of Health, every good citizen knows that it is managed with judgment, economy, and honesty. Its whole power is devolved on officials responsible to a majority of city voters, the tendency to uncleanness which is manifested in many portions would assert itself with great injury to the public health, and consequently to the business of the city. This Board performs its duty fearlessly and firmly, and has not suspected of favoritism or corruption.

It is very certain that in the introduction of the Croton into the city the work throughout, from the Croton River, forty miles distant, to and including the reservoirs, has been conducted with the highest engineering skill and solidity, and with a freedom from jobs and dishonesty never surpassed in the management of any expenditure. The work was done under a commission appointed by the State, which was presided over by Stephen Allen, whose associates partook of his unsullied reputation. In order to have the distribution of the water into houses, its distribution through proper sewers, managed with the same spirit, the Legislature was appealed to for a law creating a similar Board; and although the criticisms of the Mayor against the use of vitrified stoneware pipes in place of the brick sewers, may be sound, except for me in unimportant localities, we yet have confidence in the way the Department is wisely managed. There is a large revenue to collect and disburse; there are immense contracts to make; and a large discretion to be exercised in adjusting the payments for water, and yet there is no pretense of unfairness, favoritism, or want of integrity in the performance of these delicate and important duties. We shudder to think what would be the state of things if this great interest, so intimately connected with the domestic comforts of every household, were subjected to the sharpers who will perform no duty of legislation without pay, and who subject all not subservient to the prevailing ring to be preyed upon by the officials whose revenues were diminished by "rural legislators," when they showed mercy to the "clamor of tax-paying cliques" by expunging the worst items of the tax levy.

Nearly all that there is of good government in the city we have derived from the Police Commissioners, who, although embarrassed severely by a judiciary which favored the criminal rather than his victim, and by a population whose violations of law and right had the sympathies of municipal government, had in the main performed their duties with credit and usefulness. A powerful effort has been made to subject this valuable machinery to the control of that same interest, which has prostituted all within its reach to a discouragement of misgovernment and vice. Some apprehension is felt that this object may be accomplished, and that the small force which stands in the way of disorder may turn its energies in the opposite direction. Every citizen should watch this tendency, and oppose every effort to break down this only remaining safeguard.

The city of New York is a part of the political machinery of the State, through which the State carries out its policy in public powers. It is the gate through which a vast emigration enters and at which much of it loiters. In this respect the city is peculiar, and as we know from recent experience that the new-comer is immediately transformed into a citizen in fraud of our system of naturalization, and that he is excluded in a great measure from the whole Union, it will readily be seen that the State has an important and delicate duty to manage in this respect.

The last Legislature, in addition to curtailing the pecuniary means by which this object is expected to be accomplished, passed an amendment of the Constitution, whereby the expense of these emigrants might be a little hindered in prematurely depositing their fraudulent votes. But although from twenty to thirty thousand votes of this kind, as we have been given at the recent election for President of the United States and Governor of this State, and not only the means of emigration still reaches us with great breadth and velocity but also the repetition of this fraud is an object which criminal ambition is certain to accomplish, even at the expense of the safety of the Republic, the Governor of the State—the predecessor of the present Mayor —vetoed the bill.

The tone of the Message, corresponding with the veto, foreshadows the conflict and its character in November, 1872. If the "several State commissions which are scattered throughout the city" shall include the head of the amendment to the Registry law, the same interest which tramples every vestige of good government in this city under foot will triumph in the State and nation, and deliver them over to the tender mercies of those who ought to know government in its terrors rather than in sharing its honors.

There are strong reasons for the apprehension that, although much good has been done by the commissions appointed under State authority, the system itself is subject to all from the pressure of corruption. For many years past the number of members has at Albany increased who avowed legislation for sale, and their oaths as a farce. Whoever treats this to its source will find that it was coeval with the passage of State laws confirming or creating city railroads in New York, and that efforts to establish new lines, and particularly the Broadway railroad, have greatly increased this tendency. In advance of any action by the Albany legislature, the Common Council of New York, in the creation without legislative authority of prominent lines of city roads, and the attempted establishment of one in Broadway, had won the applaudation of the "Forty Thieves," and it was doubtless through those lobbyists who brought this stigma upon the name of State legislation has reached the point of degradation which exposes it to the censure of a city official.

But it is proper to acknowledge the good which has been done, and never fears the future may awaken. If the rural and interior districts can not send honest men to the Legislature, not only will this evil continue, but through the commissions perish, but free government will also perish, through the hands of those chosen as representatives.

GOOD SENSE AND GOOD FEELING.

THE debate upon the Alabama question has become much less excited and very reasonable. There seems to be a well-founded impression that Mr. Sumner's speech, if it expressed the official feeling of the Administration, did not indicate its probable policy; while the remarks of Mr. Motley at Liverpool, and of Lord Clarendon in Parliament, show a friendly and conciliatory spirit which forbids the expectation of any thing but the most intelligent and honorable mutual understanding between the two countries. Upon surveying the discussion, which has been both able and warm, it is remarkable that the expression of English Liberals has been with them, although wholly uncontested. Mr. Goldwin Smith at Ithaca, Mr. William E. Forster before his constituents, the Spectator and the News and the Star and the Liberal English press, Mr. Justin M'Carthy in New York, all agree in two fundamental points—that there was a most hostile feeling toward this country upon the part of the English aristocracy and middle class; and that that feeling, which the Liberals all deplore, is not an international crime.

The recognition of belligerent rights to actual belligerents they all think to be a matter wholly within the discretion of any Power, while they all agree in regretting that, as a matter of courtesy, the ministry had not awaited the arrival of Mr. Adams. In this view they are sustained by President Woolsey of Yale College, an authority in international law. Moreover, while claiming that this discretion must be left to every nation subject to question only as to the method of this exercise, many of the English Liberals assert, and none expressly deny, that the Government of Great Britain might very properly express its regret at the escape of the Alabama, whether it should prove to be technically a breach of international law or not, upon the general ground of the natural feeling in this country, and of the desirability of maintaining the most friendly relations.

These positions also, all by great stress upon one of these points which we have not properly considered. They insist, and with reason, that we have no right to assert that "England" favored the rebellion. They declare, and warmly, that "England" did no such thing. The clubs, the aristocratic journals, papers like the Times and the Saturday Review, and "society" in general, did undoubtedly feel and express sympathy for the rebels. But are such men as Richard Cobden, John Bright, Lord Houghton, Goldwin Smith, and John Elliot Cairnes, with all the working classes to whom cotton was literally a necessity of life, but who did not falter in sympathy, not to be counted in the England of to-day? As Mr. M'Carthy says, there were more people in the city of New York who sympathized with Slavery than could be found in the John O'Goat's House to Land's End; and certainly nowhere was our cause presented more boldly, more brilliantly, or more consistently than by the men whom Mr. M'Carthy named, and by the London journal of which he was an editor during the war.

What shall we Republicans in this country think if, because of the sneers of Democratic journals as equal liberty and political rights, Cassius M. Clay, John Bright, and their friends should vehemently declare that America sympathized with the British aristocracy? We should certainly be of opinion that these gentlemen had a very mistaken opinion of their best friends. Yet in one breath we declare England sympathized with the rebellion, and in the next we sneer at Goldwin Smith for total misunderstanding us. Of course, as we have before said, we deal with the Government of a country, and it can not be said that the action of the British Government was friendly. But we ought not to forget—as we confess we have sometimes forgotten when discussing the subject in these columns—that there is an England most just and most friendly to us in our darkest hour.

We are inclined to believe that the discussion will lead to greater cordiality than ever before between the nations, because it will imply an impress upon the mind of this country the conviction that there is a great party in England—a party which fairly controls the British Government—whose political philosophy is that of the great party which controls the Government of the United States; a philosophy which not only recognizes the rights and interests, but the necessary conditions of national welfare, but which substantially agrees as to the methods by which they may best be secured.

OFFICIAL RESPONSIBILITY.

WE are very glad to see that Colonel Degarmo, at a late meeting of the Radical Republican General Committee of the city, denounced in the strongest terms the plan of besieging every Governor-elect with claims for office. He is reported to have used the expression, "miserable crew of beggarly office-seekers;" and if strong, we do not suppose that it is an expression which will be regarded as inappropriate. The excellent gentlemen to whom the Colonel addressed himself seem, so far as we can gather from the reporter remarks, to have themselves, in some inscrutable way, the masters of the officers whom the President and Senate have appointed in the city. They seem to suppose that those officers are responsible to the Committee, and that not to do what any member of the Committee, or its representative, may demand, is to incur the severest censure and removal by the President. One of these official delinquents was represented by a member of the Committee, who required the appointment of one of his friends to some position in the delinquent's department, as "tossing his head as haughty as the Great Napoleon;" and when the member of the Committee asked the delinquent whether he meant "to ignore the Republican organizations of the city," the offender, with the haughty Napoleonic tossing of the head, that if "not giving office to you is ignoring the organization, then I ignore it."

For the honor of the other excellent gentlemen we are glad to record that these remarks were received with loud laughter. But it is not to their honor that Judge CULVER denounced, with applause, the remarks of Colonel DUGANNE. The officers of the United States in the city of New York are, strange as it may seem, not responsible in any degree whatsoever to any committee. They are responsible only to the President of the United States. For it is the most honorable man, who regards the continued predominance of the Republican party, who will not agree with Colonel DUGANNE that "it would be better that the organization if honest and bold words like those he had uttered were spoken often, instead of covering up the rottenness and iniquities of the party by silence or denunciation."

THE "OLD MOLE."

MR. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS is the political resident legatee of Mr. JOHN C. CALHOUN. To read Mr. STEPHENS's late letter is like reading one of Mr. CALHOUN's old speeches. He propounds the doctrine of State sovereignty as Mr. CALHOUN used to propound it, and insists that it is the orthodox doctrine as established by the Kentucky Resolutions of '98. "A nation is a "nation of nations," the Union is a Confederacy, and nothing but calamity and catastrophe await us until we return to the philosophy of Calhoun and the practice of the old Confederation. Meanwhile, we are drifting toward the overthrow of liberty.

Mr. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, who gloried in an empire founded upon the corner-stone of Slavery, has, of course, a lively conception of Liberty. There was never, in fact, a man more amusingly unconscious than he. At the beginning of the war he was gravely thought to be a "Union man." But those who have followed his career will certainly relieve him of all suspicion of ever having valued the Union except as the fortification of the sheerest despotism. When he made his speech in reply to Mr. Toombs, at the beginning of the secession movement, it was reprinted and extolled in all the loyal States as indicative of the existence of a sound conservatism in the rebel leaders. But it is only just to Mr. STEPHENS to say that he has been always consistent. He has never been a Union man except in the old Southern sense. He has not had the least faith in the American doctrine of liberty. He was as hearty a rebel as Mr. Toombs, but his policy differed radically from that of the dominant secession leader.

In 1858, when Mr. STEPHENS retired from Congress, he made a speech at Milledgeville in which he stated the reasons of his retirement. They were substantially that the victory of the South—that is, of slavery—was secure. It had been decided by the Supreme Court that slaves could be carried into the Territories and held there as property. In other words, slavery was the national law, and liberty a mere local provision. This great principle, the most conservative of all conceivable in a system of confederated sovereignties, according to the Democratic party, being fully and finally established, he felt justified in withdrawing from Congress, but held himself always in readiness to maintain "the rights of the South" in the usual way. In the same speech Mr. STEPHENS said that the fathers of the Government undoubtedly held anti-slavery opinions. But they did not understand the subject. Their successors did understand it, however. They knew that it was the bulwark of religion and the foundation of freedom.

When Mr. LINCOLN was elected, and the secession movement began, Mr. STEPHENS thought it would be the wiser policy for slavery to remain in the Union, and to count upon the timidity of trade, the obscurity of the actual provisions of the Constitution, and the determination which the long dominance of a party which had no policy but the perpetuation of slavery had worked in the public mind. He was therefore opposed to secession. It involved war, and the issue of war was necessarily doubtful. The better course, in his judgment, was to remain in the Union and confirm the Southern control of it. But the more violent men had their way, and the movement began. Mr. STEPHENS opposed it not in the interest of the Union, but of Southern supremacy in the Union.

In his lately published letter he gravely says that the war was "inaugurated" by the authorities at Washington, while the Confederate Commissioners, with the olive branch of peace in their hands, were at the seat of the General Government." This is a sufficient illustration of the character of Mr. STEPHENS's view of our government and of the value of his suggestions. We are drifting to a despotism, because each State is not allowed to leave the Union at its pleasure. This fundamental principle of our institutions must be restored, he says. But Mr. STEPHENS conceals that the return to the right path is not to be effected by force; it must be accomplished at the ballot-box.

His letter shows that nothing whatever is to be hoped from the disciples of the old Southern school of State sovereignty, and it is curious only as a last illustration of the purely visionary political philosophy of CALHOUN, which contains nothing but exuperience, humanity, and justice from its consideration.

THE ELECTIONS IN FRANCE.

The result of the late election in France, which the London Times sums up by saying that three and a half millions voted for the empire and three millions against it, is certainly very significant. The plan of Paris followed are not less so. The circumstances show conclusively that the empire is not a success. With all its prosperity it increases in has not established itself in the confidence of France, and the result at the polls must be interpreted as a virtual condemnation. It was upon "the glory of France" that LOUIS NAPOLEON depended. He meant to increase its prestige, and to appeal to the Celtic love of renown—a certain refined national vanity. Personal prestige he had none; but he inherited a name flattering to Frenchmen. A sincere desire of really elevating his country he has never shown; but he has constantly displayed a willingness to appeal to the old methods, which are in themselves insulting, as implying a nation of children.

The humanities of every kind are foreign to the empire. Literature and art have languished, and their most illustrious representatives, if not exiled, have been in the Opposition. Of the great events of the reign the Crimean war was the most soothing to French feeling. The Italian campaign ended fatally by the alienation of Italy, and of all those at home whom it should have been the imperial policy to conciliate. The Mexican enterprise was an unspeakable humiliation, and the position of France during the war between Prussia and Austria covered the empire with ridicule. France helped to keep Europe from making Italy free. France bustered against a united Germany; Prussia humbled Austria, and is making Germany a unit. Meanwhile the empire has beautified Paris. But its domestic policy has been merely bread and games. It has done nothing to elevate or strengthen the people. It has treated them as a lion-tamer treats his wild beasts—apparently their master, but conscious of their blood-thirsty hostility. "When the Emperor and Empress drove through Montmartre yesterday they were entirely unattended," says the telegraph. But there is not an intelligent man in Paris or elsewhere who does not know that every other time the crowd was probably a gendarme in plain dress.

The obvious course for the Emperor to pursue is one that is not agreeable to him, and which he will probably not adopt. It is to accept a responsible Ministry; to show some kind of deference to the popular will; to reveal some little comprehension of the age in which he lives, and of the irresistible influences that surround him. LOUIS NAPOLEON has been playing a part in which his uncle could not succeed, although he may very safely be considered more in history. His empire has been a game of personal aggrandizement. It has been ignoble and selfish; and at the end of seventeen years, with all his despotic power, he can not prevent a virtual verdict of the people against him and his rule. LOUIS NAPOLEON has been unequal to one of the greatest opportunities in history.

RHODE ISLAND FALTERING.

It is mortifying that the stanch little Republican State of Rhode Island, whose conduct in the war had just been so triumphantly vindicated against the aspersions of her Senator, Mr. SPRAGUE, will be carried away by Mr. ANTHONY, is President pro tem. of the Senate which passed the Fifteenth Amendment, should have been the only Republican State to falter in the adoption of that Amendment. The assent of twenty-eight States, we believe, is wanted, and twenty-four have already ratified. Rhode Island was considered as not less sure than her neighbors Massachusetts and Vermont. But if Vermont should imitate Rhode Island and postpone action until next winter, it might be justly argued that the Republican Congress had proposed an amendment which the Republican party in the country did not approve.

The action of the Rhode Island Legislature is a censure upon the vote of her Senators; and although it may be only temporary, it is a low an displeasure with Mr. SPRAGUE for maligning the courage of his fellow-soldiers, does it also wish to declare that in voting for the amendment Senator ANTHONY and Mr. ANTHONY misrepresented his State? The explanation volunteered in some quarters that the laws of Rhode Island were unjustly upon the foreign-born voters, and that the amendment would abolish inequality, is ludicrous. That is the very intention of the amendment. It certainly did not originate with the inequality from one class of voters to another.

In this State of New York the suffrage laws are unjustly unequal in other way, and our Legislature promptly ratified the amendment. The naturalized foreigner now votes in this State upon easier terms than the colored native. This, of course, is the work of the Democratic party—a party steadily hostile to equal rights. But there is no party example so much to be avoided as the Democratic. We hope that our Republican friends in Rhode Island will reflect upon the extraordinary position in which they place their Senator, whom they have not censured as well as the great mass of their party comrades in the country, by refusing a prompt acquiescence in the amendment which formally closes the great political controversy of this generation.

FROM GEORGIA.

We learn from Georgia that our Southern brethren are much interested in the chances of a war with England. The tripartite treaty has been heard of in that part of the country, and a contest with England, France, and Spain is, as we are informed, regarded as "a big job." The proper commercial class, therefore, is not favorable to the CHANDLER policy. Another and a large class is, however, anxious for the fray. Those who compose this class are of opinion that a foreign war would relax the cruel hand of "the North" in its relentless crushing of all the rights of "the oppressed, peaceable, and law-abiding, yet chivalric and long-forbearing South." Still another class, small and heroic, "sticks to the flag" pure and simple.

Our correspondent speaks rather contemptuously of the colored citizens, remarking that "they know not what a war than they. It is one side shooting guns at the other side." He should touch the point of ignorance gently, however, for ignorance in our correspondent's region is not confined, we believe, to the colored race. It certainly is not in ours. We value his representations, which are made in excellent humor, because he has a man of experience. He served four years as a soldier—in a gray uniform—and is now wholly in favor of peace.

His letter serves to suggest once more that what this country needs is repose, that it may be healed. Every thing that distracts the public mind from tranquil industry, every delicious speech and article, kindles hopes as false as foolish. The little events constantly reported from the Southern States are indications which should never be forgotten. If a series of elections should give the Democratic party to be strong again, we should hear once more the voice of "the South," as we heard it a year ago in Tammany Hall. We must not suppose, because WADE HAMPTON and TOOMBS and their friends are not making speeches, that there is a profound love of the Union and respect for loyal men in the South which awaits orators reporters. We are not, indeed, to assume that they are plotting new rebellions; but we are to assume a state of feeling which any proper occasion would develop into hostility and act accordingly.

EDMUND TROWBRIDGE DANA.

No one who knew Mr. DANA will be surprised to hear of death, for he had been during many years a grievous sufferer with hopeless disease. His fine abilities, his careful and thorough training, his wit, his wisdom—whatever promises in a man noble employment—were for all permanent outward results baffled by that relentless foe. But, conscious both of his powers and of his doom, he was always steadfast and serene. Firm, generous, and just —of an antique sense of honor, and of a truly chivalric because most humane temper—EDMUND DANA lived and died in a kind of heroic silence, and will be always tenderly recalled by his friends as one of the loftiest influences upon their lives and characters. Mr. DANA died at the house of his venerable father, RICHARD H. DANA, in Boston, on the 18th of May.

NOTES.

A FRIEND reminds us that Mr. HARDING, the English law counsel of whose "stomach-ache" at the time of the escape of the Alabama we spoke derisively the other day, was really seized with insanity, and died without recovering. The fact had escaped us, or we should certainly not have spoken of the illness in so light a tone.

GOVERNOR CURTIN, in his speech at the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, wisely forbore to indulge in any remarks upon the general foreign policy of the country, and confined himself to some very natural reminiscences of the conduct of the war most gratifying to Pennsylvanians. The State sent more than three hundred thousand men to the war, and upon the soil of Pennsylvania the decisive battle of Gettysburg was fought. Governor CURTIN claims, also, that his State was foremost in humane care for the soldiers in the field, and he hopes that it will continue to care for them liberally hereafter. The Governor's speech was discreet, which is high praise in these days.

The New York World, whose correspondent at West Point informs us that the chapel at that spot will be hallowed by the fact that its floor has been trodden by the feet of BEAUREGARD and LEE, among others, finds in the presence of General GRANT there only an occasion of sneering; and the paper publishes with relish the remark of a Canadian journal of rebel sympathies that GRANT merely commanded the armies of the United States when "the South yielded to sheer weight of metal." The man who if he could not chastise his neighbor could at least make faces at his sister is the type of the friends and abettors of a rebellion who, now that it is unconditionally subdued, sneer at the General who did the work. If the country had only had that "great statesman," HORATIO SEYMOUR, in the White House, and that patriotic warrior, General BUELL, at head-quarters, what a glorious triumph we should have had!

A SUMMER SHOWER.

Ever since noon have the clouds, deathly white
With the brooding heat, veiled the summer sky,
And the sweet glare of the sun's fierce light
From the reapers, reaping the bearded rye.

Now they pause in their work and look to the west,
Where, far in the distance across the wide plain,
The mountain line beyond his dense wooded crest,
And round it the dark clouds heap heavy with rain.

Abroad in the fields and the meadows close by
The cattle are huddled in groups 'neath the trees,
Some pawing the ground, some, with heads lifted high
And nostrils dilated, stand sniffing the breeze.

The dust from the highway is every where blown:
The poplars' green leaves, as with terror, turn white;
And the air with straws from the gleaning is sown,
Scattered wide by and fast from the wind in its flight.

The stream, that a moment ago was like glass,
Is wrinkled now like a face full of pain;
And the feathery tops of the tall meadow grass
Bend down with the weight of the fast-falling rain.

The reapers come running in haste through the rye,
Up the lane, past the house, where I stand at the door;
Heavy loaded and dripping the teams hurry by:
Then I mark the first flash and the thunder's dull roar.

And the clouds of a sudden seem riven in twain;
The rain comes in torrents the mad, gusty skies;
The parched earth sends up from the hot steaming plain
A thick vapor veil that envelops the hills.

All at once from a rent in the vast dome of gray
A sunbeam shoots out like an arrow of fire,
Gilding farm-house and river and hill in its way,
And spanning the east bangs the bow in the sky.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE assessed value of real and personal estate in the city of New York is estimated by MAYOR HALL at $1,000,000,000. But every body knows that the assessed value does not amount to one-third of the real valuation of property. If our Government and that of New York it would therefore have in hand a property really somewhat more than the entire public debt.

Preparations are being made for a semi-centennial celebration by the Alumni of Union College.

The President has made inquiry into the reports of abuse of the Indians and natives of Alaska, and of a lack of discipline among a portion of the troops, and has decided to remove the whole commander.

Advices from Arizona report that 160 Indians had attacked a party of Government employés at work for Camp Grant. They killed three men and wounded three others, and, having run off a number of the herders over 200,000 persons were present. At Liverpool $6,000 was the highest premium.

In the Spanish Cortes, June 12, Navarre advocated the election of Don Carlos Montpensier.

In Cuba a heavy engagement has occurred at Puerto Padre. The Spaniards admit a loss of 80 killed, and wounded. The insurgents acknowledge a loss of 1200. The insurgent General Marmore was killed.

The Austrian General at Lechrun was assassinated there on the night of May 24, while walking with the Austrian General Gablenville. The latter was also wounded.

The principal shops in Paris are henceforth to be closed on Sundays.

From July 26, 1856, to May 31, 1869, the receipts in the Art Schools of Kensington, England have averaged about £600 per day.

At one of the May meetings in Exeter Hall, London, Lord Lawrence, late Governor-General of British India, said, "I have known the American missionaries in India for upward of thirty years, and I know that to the influence of their presence the Government of India with which they have been nobly occupied, has been of a most beneficial character. I have seen one illustration of that. Fifteen years ago the American missionaries had not set up schools in the town of Lahore, and within a year or two they had gathered together a dozen or a hundred scholars. When I left the Punjaub, in 1859, the schools then contained five hundred scholars: when I returned to India as Governor-General, I found that the number had increased to 1900. It must be remembered, too, that not only are these missionaries in no way connected with the Government of India, but they belong to a country which is quite distinct and separate from England; and, nevertheless, they have taken their labors, and so important were the results which attended them, that a large body of Englishmen in the Punjaub and the northern parts of India zealously and effectually supported the American Mission in that part of the country."

Sections A, B, C, D, E, F, have 29 slips each; Sections 1 and 16 have 27 slips each; Sections A, M, N, O, have 33 slips each; all other Sections have 32 slips each. The top part of each Section, Letter, and Figure is toward slip No. 1. The short lines in the passage ways indicate stairways.

THE PEACE JUBILEE, BOSTON—GROUND-PLAN OF THE COLISEUM.

GOLDEN-ROD.

It was the very last day at Seaview. On the morrow there was to be a general flitting. Trunks stood in the halls, locked and strapped, though every body had kept some last box open, saved out some decorations for the evening. They were going to dance, and to make the affair as gay as one ever can make a last evening, with the subtle, prophetic sadness which always seems to haunt the air.

Lucy Haversham had hurried through her packing, and two hours after dinner she went down into the hall, where she knew well enough some one waited for her. A handsome man looked up from the newspaper he was making pretense of reading, when he heard her foot on the stairs, and came forward to meet her. A tall, noble-looking fellow, with a fair Saxon face and clear blue eyes. John Pembroke was a man whom all owned liked. Miss Haversham had meant to be an exception, and had carried herself distantly when the first came to Seaview, but had ended by something a little more than a flirtation, a little less, perhaps, than a love-affair with him. She had a good deal of worldly wisdom. She knew that she needed money, and had no certain prospect of it. Her uncle had brought her up as liberally as if she had been his own daughter, but if he should die to-morrow she was not sure of money enough to keep her in gloves. He might have willed her something, or he might not. He had never told her, and she knew that to make a brilliant marriage had been the object and end of her social training—the one thing her Uncle and Aunt Haversham expected of her in return for all their outlays in her behalf.

It was a strange oversight on their part which had allowed her to come to Seaview, and be left there to her own devices. Mrs. Haversham had been in mourning for her sister, and, of course, out of society. She did not care to let her niece go to any very gay place without her; and, just as they were settling their plans, some friends had begged for Miss Haversham's company at Seaview, and her aunt and uncle had consented.

To be sure, they might have been justified in trusting something to the common-sense of their niece. Lucy was in her twenty-fourth year, and had already proved herself to be any thing but an easily impressed young lady; and then, she had been well instructed as to what the other high contracting party in any matrimonial contract she might form was expected to bring. Miss Haversham was accustomed to reason about it very coolly and clearly.

She had known from the first that Mr. Pembroke was poor; that he had nothing but his old name, his handsome face, and fascinating manner, and a certain amount of talent for drawing, which always made his illustrations in demand, and on the proceeds of which he lived. This knowledge made her very distant toward him at first, and she was utterly at a loss as to what had brought about the change, and established their more than friendly relations. She knew well enough that he meant to ask her before they parted for some pledge of constancy, and she had settled her own course in her mind. She did not ask herself how much she cared about him, or whether she was likely ever to care as much for any one else. She preferred to put those points out of sight, and consider only the manifest impossibility of her making plus nothing, being equal to the demands of fashionable life. In those days she had never thought of any other kind of life as possible. So she had a purpose this afternoon. She meant to make him see the matter as he did, and she meant to make him see it before he had subjected himself to the pain of hearing, or her to the pain of saying, "No."

She nodded gayly as she met him, and said a few merry words as they went down the steps together; but he was in no lively mood, and her gay smiles provoked no rejoinder.

"It is so good of you," he said, at last, "to give me one more walk, busy as I know you are to-day, among these dear old scenes. I believe every one of them is photographed on my heart and brain. I think I shall never forget one tree, or one of these old rocks, or just how the tide comes up among those crags, or the sunset that flushes sky and sea. There is only one thing makes a man's memory so clear—one thing which I have learned this summer, for the first time."

Lucy Haversham trembled a little. She felt a mutinous longing to hear what he had to say—to let him go on. Something told her that her whole life would hold no sweeter draught than he was offering her just now. She must have cared for him more than she had known, or these low words, this tender, pleading tone would not be so dangerously sweet. But she had traced out her course beforehand, and she would not be lured away from it by false lights.

"Don't be sentimental," she rejoined; "it is not at all becoming;" and this time there was something hollow in the gayety of her tone. "Do you not know that sentiment is out of fashion? I, at least, was brought up to look on it as forbidden fruit. Of course I am to marry some day, but that will be an affair of common-sense, not sentiment."

"What do you mean?"

Pembroke's voice was low and a little hoarse. There was an earnestness in it which compelled the truth in her lips. She answered him as frankly as she would have acknowledged the facts to her own soul.

"Merely what I say. Not that I despise sentiment, but that I am too poor to indulge in it. I have nothing of my own. When I marry, it will be a man rich enough to give me all that I have been accustomed to. I shall not be a happier woman, or make my husband a better wife, for having talked sentiment with you under the trees at Seaview. Let us confine ourselves to nonsense."

He stopped right in the path where they were walking, and took both her hands in his.

"Look at me," he said, almost sternly.

She looked up at him; her dark cheeks crimson, her great brown eyes telling him what she meant he should never know, her lips tempting him with the ripe sweetness that some day another man's money was to buy.

"If it were not for the one lordly wisdom, this cursed prudence, you would have loved me, he said, after he had read the story in her eyes.

"Very well—I shall not envy the man who will be your husband. I would not exchange places with him."

"Your words are not choice ones," she retorted, with an indignant tone and glance, but, at the same time, a grieved quiver of lip and eyelash.

He released her hands, and bowed courteously. "If I forgot myself, pardon me, Miss Haversham. It will not happen again."

He commenced at once to talk about other subjects: of the following morning to change the autumn flowers adorning the paths; some illustrations he was making for a book of poems; the people they had met at Seavirw: steering clear, very carefully, of all dangerous themes.

Somehow Miss Haversham had succeeded almost too well for her own pleasure. She wished he had not understood her so quickly, or not obeyed her so readily. She longed to hear him say once more that he loved her, though that was the very thing she had prevented him from saying. She was too proud a woman, however, to make any steps backward; besides, she understood perfectly that she had done the only wise thing. So she joined in his converse upon indifferent matters, and ever all the time more vexed to see how easy he seemed to find it.

On the way home he gathered a handful of golden-rod, selecting carefully the richest and fullest blossoms.

"Will you wear some of these to-night?" he asked her. "The flower should suit you, for there is no sentiment about it, and its name suggests the quality which must commend objects to your taste. I shall never see this splendid orange hue will look in your dark hair."

"Yes, I will wear them," she said, putting out her hand for the blossoms. "I will wear them—they are royal. I wonder who will gather golden-rod for me next year?"

"I will, if I am alive, and you are not married."

She had made the remark in a half nervous strain, not expecting any answer. His words, so earnestly spoken, half startled her.

"You will forget," she said, trying to be carelessly gay.

"You will forget," he would surprise me so much as that a man should have a memory a year long."

"Perhaps, then, I shall have the pleasure of surprising you."

She laughed and shook her head, as she rang up the piano with the flowers in her hand; but, once in her own room, she felt no inclination to laugh. Something in his tone had been wax in her heart. She felt as if in some strange way hope had been swept out of her life; as if she cared not what might happen to her in future, since one star would rise for her no more.

She roused herself at last to dress for the evening. She selected with much this last night. She put on a thin black dress, through which her neck and arms gleamed, polished and perfect as marble. She fastened among the long sprays of golden-rod in her heavy falling hair, and shaped the wreath like a coronet above her brow. The effect was splendid. She looked like a princess with a crown of dusky gold.

John Pembroke's eyes kindled a little as he came to meet her. It was a surprise to him. Beautiful as he had always thought her, there was about her this evening a queenlier grace, a subtler charm, than he could nothing. If was not his way to pay compliments, except with his eyes; and he certainly, that night, did not pay them with his lips.

It was midnight when Lucy went up stairs, with some vexation that Pembroke had been singing ringing in her ears:

"My heart is heavy, my heart is old,
And that proves dross which I counted gold;
I watch in vain for the curtain's folds—
The window is dark, and the night is cold,
And the door forever told."

Was the story forever told? Had she lost something she might yet seek for vainly and with tears? She looked out of her window toward the sea that lay tossing beneath the September moon. She had chosen her room for this same glimpse of that wide waste of waters. It meant Eternity to her, because it stretched away into a boundless mystery which seemed infinite. She approached her window once more and more searching than any preacher's voice would ever utter. Her worldly aims, her petty cares of this life, always shrank into insignificance when she looked from that window. Gazing out, now, it seemed to her as if this world were done with; and, standing on the shore of some other life, she could measure calmly what she had done in this. And she asked herself had she done well?

There might be greater and better men in the world than John Pembroke; but she had lived twenty-four years without ever finding one whose heart made answer to her heart as she knew that his might. She knew there were things she could say to him that she could never say to any one else. Apparently light fellow that he was, she knew his nature was honest, and fearless, and reverent—that he looked toward eternity with a straightforward, earnest-purposed, unshrinking gaze; and she saw what she had lost. From the unquiet, glistening sea a voice seemed to come, whispering, as he had sung, of a "story forever told"—her life's story, of which she had made a failure so soon.

The damp chill of the night was penetrating her veins, saturating her garments. She got up, shut her window, and, in shutting out white moon and tossing sea, seemed to have shut out with them part of her pain.

She got down to a late breakfast the next morning. Her train did not go until eleven.

"So Pembroke is gone?"

Some one said this as she was descending the stairs. Miss Haversham felt her heart stand still as she waited for the answer.

"Pembroke? Yes. He said he had business to see to which wouldn't let him wait. He was off at eight o'clock."

She was thankful that she had heard the news, and got over the pang it caused when no investigating eyes were taking note of her. When she joined the group at the door she was able to hear the same tidings over again quite unmoved, and answer gayly, as her wont was, to all sallies about him.

She had not been back in town more than three weeks before she saw in the columns of a literary paper an announcement that the publishers of a certain poet, desiring to issue a volume with illustrations, had arranged with Pembroke for the designs, and he had gone abroad to confer on the subject with the author, and to study the poems at his leisure among the scenes where they were written.

She either did not feel any thing, or she would not let herself know that she felt it. She read the passage as she would have read a similar item of news about any other artist; and that was all.

Miss Haversham had a gay season that year: it kept her too busy and too tired to think much. Fortunately, in the set in which she moved Pembroke, for the present, was little known, and there was not much danger of her hearing his name mentioned. She had one trunk into which she never looked. So it she had thrust hurriedly, the last day of September, all her tokens of Seaview—a carved box, among other things, that held the withered sprays of golden-rod, the fanciful crown, which had been his last gift to her.

Summer came round again. Lucy Haversham had grown more tasteless, and she suspected how restlessness might easily degenerate into crossness. During August and September the family were in Europe. They had a carriage there, and meant to stay as long as the weather was pleasant and there was any thing going on.

Soon Miss Haversham began to see that for there was something very special going on. She had met a few times in society, during the last winter, one Reginald Gore, a man in whose veins flowed the purest of blue blood. A fine, cool dignity pervaded his manners. You know without being told what his features were—the high head, the delicate nose, the thick, long hair, the thin, passionless, proud lips. He was a man whom the world delighted to honor; wealthy, and of good descent. His attentions conferred honor, like a patent of nobility; and Miss Haversham began unconsciously to set a higher value upon herself when she found that she was singled out as their recipient.

He did not make love to her at all. For lovemaking, as he generally practiced it, he was quite too cool and too dignified. But he sought no other woman's side—he drove and rode with her; his mother and sisters drove with her, and showed themselves ready to make her welcome at the cottage where the Gores had held summer festivals for so many vanished years. Mrs. Gore and her daughters were not handsome. There had been something very charming in the mother's face long ago, but she was as lifeless and proper now as a lay figure hung with cachemires, and glittering as proper jewels with diamonds. Miss Gore and Miss Margaret were like their brother—like him in pride and in dignity, as far as their inferior natures allowed.

They were not of Lucy Haversham's kind. She felt chilled when she sat with them in their very proper, well-appointed rooms, or drove with them, at sober pace, in their faultlessly well-appointed family carriage. To say that her uncle and aunt were gratified would be to put it very mildly indeed. They had social tact enough not to display any undue exhilaration; but their niece, if no one else, understood it perfectly.

"Has it occurred to you, my dear," said Mrs. Haversham, one day, attempting extreme dignity, "that Mr. Gore's attentions are very marked, and that you are likely soon to be obliged to answer to him the most important question of your life?"

"The importance of the question depends on my reply, aunt," Lucy answered, perversely. "A woman's rejected suitors are not of any especial consequence to her."

Rejected! Mrs. Haversham put up both hands, as if to ward off a blow, and a look of blank horror crossed her face. "Have you been flirting with Mr. Gore?"

"Hardly. I think the affair has been rather too cool and stately on both sides to be called a flirtation, aunt. Mr. Gore is not given to sentiment: and I don't think I am now."

"Mr. Gore's attentions are an honor—and you will do well to estimate them at their value, Lucy. How many such opportunities do you think are likely to offer themselves? You are not an heiress, and not a great beauty."

A glint like steel came into Lucy Haversham's eyes, but she controlled her temper perfectly. It seemed as if her uncle and aunt were growing tired of her. The tears filled her eyes, her face turned white.

"I will not disappoint you if I can help it, dear aunt," she said, in a low, tremulous voice; and then she went out of the room.

The 29th of September came round, and old memories were haunting her like ghosts. Just one year ago that day she had walked with John Pembroke at Seaview, and he had gathered the golden-rod for her hair. He had promised to gather it again for her this year, if she were not married still. Then she thought bitterly what wastes of waters rolled between them—what oceans, bitterer and yet more impassable, swept them apart.

That afternoon, when upon the beach with Mr. Gore, he asked her to be his wife. His manner never varied from its cool, calm dignity. His words were admiring and respectful, rather than fervent. If they had come yesterday she might have said yes; for in this offer the very things she had coveted, position attractive, the man she had once set before herself as the only things needful, were laid at her feet—all of them, and more. But, even while Mr. Gore listened to Mr. Gore's courtly words, her mind had been roaming with John Pembroke among the asters and golden-rod at Seaview; and the dear life she could not bring herself to make him the promise he asked. But neither did she refuse it.

"Let me give you my answer to-morrow," was all she said. "It is a momentous question, not to be decided hastily."

And Mr. Gore, sure of his triumph in the end, admired her sense of dignity; and talked tranquilly about Ruskin and Turner as they went home through the crimson sunset.

When Miss Haversham opened the door of her room she saw a box upon her table strongly tied, and with express labels on it. Her heart gave a great bound. She wrenched at the cords and tore them off. When the cover was removed she saw a moss basket, neatly packed, filled with sprays of golden-rod; and, lying on it, a little note, which she opened and read. It contained but a few words. "I promised you golden-rod on the 29th of September, this year, if you were still unmarried. I came back from over the seas to keep my word, and show you that one man has 'a memory a year long.'"

She would have known the handwriting, even if she had not been remembering all day the promise which seemed so impossible of fulfilment. Was it possible, also, that the old story had not been "forever told"—that for her there was still "place for repentance?"

The next morning she gave Mr. Gore an answer that surprised him. There was a new and sweet humility in her manner, which almost charmed him into forgiving her, in spite of his anger.

"Perhaps you will despise me," she said, after telling him that she could not be his wife. "After having been so much together you may have had reason to expect a different answer; and I believe I should have given a different one had you asked me before yesterday. But I have been searching my own heart, and I have found that one old memory had power enough to keep me from being to you a loyal, loving wife, and you are too noble to be deceived into marrying any other."

Mr. Gore forbore entreaties or reproaches. He was too proud for the one, too truly a gentleman for the other. He did not refuse, either, to take the little hand put out to him so pleadingly. Lucy Haversham had done him good, though as yet he might know it not. He would have more faith in love, henceforth, more respect for all women, because this one had been true to herself.

Lucy went from her interview with him to one scarcely less trying with her aunt. In it she told the truth, and the whole truth. Mrs. Haversham found it in vain to blame or to remonstrate. The next day she took her niece away.

It seemed as if some fairy kept John Pembroke advised of Miss Haversham's movements. She had not been at home a week before, one evening, his card was brought up to her room, as he happened to be dressed as he had seen her last, in black. She waited a moment to put the golden-rod, which careful tending had kept fresh, in her hair. Then she went down, looking again a radiant queen, whom the crown of dusky gold suited well. When the first greetings were over he touched the blossoms in her hair.

"Did you wear them to give me courage?" he asked, looking into her eyes.

"I wore them," she said, softly, "because I loved them—because I have found they are the only gold with a heart-beat—that the things I used to think necessary were only pleasant, not vital."

"And you are ready to do without them, and trust to me to keep want and care away from the woman I love? Are you mine, now?"

He was holding her close, and looking straight into her face, where the blushes burned. She gave him a smile, in which her soul was fused like a pearl.

"If you want me, yes."

"You shall never be sorry, while God gives me life to love you."

And she never has been.

PALM HOUSE BOTANIC GARDEN, WASHINGTON.

THERE are few places in Washington city more interesting to visitors than the Botanic Garden at the foot of Capitol Hill. We give on page 404 an illustration of Palm House, situated in this Garden, and designed as a conservatory for tropical plants.

The Botanic Garden lies between Pennsylvania and Maryland avenues, on the north and south, and First and Third streets West on the east and west, with the main entrance on First Street, opposite the middle gate of the Capitol grounds, and another entrance directly opposite on Third Street, the two entrances being connected by a main avenue, which is paved with broad flag-stones. On the south side of the main avenue is the green-house, consisting of a central circular building, sixty feet in diameter and fifty-five feet in height, east and west of which are two smaller octagonal buildings, each connected with the central building by a parallelogram, the whole having a length of three hundred feet. The eastern octagon and parallelogram are built of cedar and glass, and have been occupied ten years. The central building, which is the one shown in our cut, and the western octagon and parallelogram have been recently completed; they are constructed of marble, iron, and glass, at a cost of $45,000.

Here, side by side, may be seen the true and bastard cinnamon, whose mixture in the cinnamon of commerce so often defrauds the consumer; and here the delicious vanilla attains a high state of perfection. Here are twenty species of palms, every one of them graceful, and a large variety of the rarest ferns—a single plant of one species of which sold, at a recent sale in Baltimore, for ninety dollars. Here is the curious date plant, which the imaginative and superstitious Spaniard has called the Spirits Sacata, or Holy Ghost plant. And here imported from the Holy Land) is Christ's thorn, the same species from which came the thorns that crowned the Martyr of Calvary. Here is a bamboo-tree, which has already attained the height of eight feet; and it is hoped that experiments prompted by this establishment may result in raising this valuable tree flourish in some of our Southern States.

THE SEA OF GALILEE.

THE scene selected for our illustration on page 405 is from a painting by MR. WILLIAM SELMS, an English artist. A view of the Sea of Galilee (connected so closely with the Saviour's ministry), looking southwest from the highest point of the Castle of Safed, which, like the town, was crumbled almost to dust by an earthquake. In the extreme distance are the mountains of Ajlun, following the course of the Jordan on to the Dead Sea. At the farther point of the land, on the right-hand shore, is the town of Tiberias. On the point nearer the spectator, on the same side, is the village of Magdala. Still nearer, under the cliffs and consequently out of sight, is the place where Capernaum once stood, and part of the flat, on the margin of the sea, known by the name of Gennesareth. Safed, in the fore-ground, is one of the holy places of the Jews, many of whom repair to it from all parts of the world to end their days; and a more forlorn, sickly, squalid—not to say dirty—set of melancholy ghosts it would be difficult to find.

METHODIST PUBLISHING AND MISSION BUILDINGS, NEW YORK.

On page 405 we give a view of the new Methodist Publishing and Mission Buildings in this city, corner of Broadway and Eleventh Street. The lot occupied by these buildings has a front on Broadway of 76 feet 7 inches; on Eleventh Street, 103 feet 3 inches. A massive building, five stories above the basement, with iron fronts, and of superior architectural design, covers the entire lot. The ceilings are lofty, so much so that the edifice is nearly an entire story higher than the surrounding five-story buildings. The extensive area of each floor is without interior walls, the ceilings being supported by numerous iron columns. This will render it convenient to erect partitions at pleasure. The basement room and entrance are under Broadway, and 14 feet and 11 inches under Eleventh Street. This contains an area of 20,114 square feet; the first story floors above 15,665 square feet each, and remaining three floors 10,959 square feet each, making a total area of 84,421 square feet—a number nearly equal to two acres. The basement floor covers nearly one half acre. The building is entirely new (now nearly completed), constructed in the most substantial manner, the ironwork having been put up by MESSRS. J. B. and W. W. CORNELL. Good judges pronounce the front one of the finest and the most imposing on Broadway. The cost of the building is $900,000. The yearly rental value of the Book-store alone is set at $50,000. The Missionary Society bears one-fourth of the expense of the whole property.

HOW AUTHORS ARE PAID

IS days now happily gone by an author had to write a fulsome dedication to his book, hoping to get a good present from his patron; but now authors write for the public, and the publishers take good care to cater to its taste. The same publishers pay authors now for their works are wonderful—a striking contrast to those paid in former times. Scott, even after the failure of Ballantyne & Co., retained their debts from £117,000 to £55,000, which latter sum was paid by his executors out of the moneys arising from his life insurance, copyright property, and other literary remains. With respect to living writers, we have only the authority of the newspapers for what follows; but even if they magnify in some cases the exaggeration is significant. It is stated that Lord (then Sir E. B.) Lytton received £100 for each week's installment of "A Strange Story;" and that Mr. Wilkie Collins received £5000 for a novel contributed to the Cornhill. Messrs. Blackwood & Sons are said to have paid Miss Evans £3500 for "Silas Marner;" £4000 for "The Mill on the Floss;" and £7000 for "Romola." The Literary Budget stated that in 1862 Mr. Coventry Patmore was paid £2000 by Messrs. Macmillan & Co. for his "Victories of Love," contributed to Macmillan's Magazine—or about a guinea a line. Messrs. Strahan & Co., the publishers of Good Words, placed £5000 to the credit of Dr. Guthrie, for the purpose of his going to the Holy Land and there writing a Commentary on the Bible, to be published in monthly numbers. The same publishers paid £1000 to Mr. Millais for twelve illustrations to "The Parables read in the Light of the Present Day," by Guthrie. Messrs. Lacroix & Co., of Brussels, stated that they paid Victor Hugo £16,000, or 400,000 francs, for "Les Misérables," but the author was for twenty years engaged on the work. According to the Pall Mall Gazette, the same publishers have just signed a contract with Victor Hugo to purchase, for the sum of £12,000, the right of publication for a limited term of all historical novel, in four volumes, entitled "Par Ordre du Roi" (By Order of the King), the scene of which is laid in England, at the close of the seventeenth century, together with a volume of poems, entitled "Fin de Satan," and a volume composed of three dramas not intended for representation, and entitled "Théâtre en Liberté."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A FACT.—The Laws of Natural Philosophy are invio-lable. You can't even pick up any thing at an auction unless it has been first knocked down!

What reason is there to suppose that frost has an interesting effect on flat fish?—Because in frosty weather we so often see soles and skates "screwed" together.

A wealthy merchant, who had become a bankrupt, was met, some time after his misfortune, by a friend, who asked him how he was getting on. "Pretty well," said he. "I am upon my legs again." "How, indeed?" "Yes; I have been obliged to part with my carriage and horses, and must now walk."

A witness being interrogated as to his knowledge of the defendant in the case, said he knew him intimately—"he had supped with him, sailed with him, and horsewhipped him."

A WHEELCOUPEDE.

It has only one wheel,
Neither treadle nor saddle:
It is built in such fashion
That you don't have to straddle.
The man who propels it
Takes hold with his hands
Of two parallel bars,
And on the ground stands:
Puts his feet in motion,
One after the other,
While the wheel goes,
Without any bother.
This funny machine
Has no painting or gilding:
It is useful to carry
Material for building—
Shingles and shavings,
Brick, lime, and plaster—
And the lighter the load,
It can travel the faster:
It is better than a bicycle,
For it isn't so narrow;
And our wheelcoupede
We will call a wheel-barrow!

Type-setters should be careful to dip their fingers into the right boxes. Our Ward an editor has been sued for libel, in having published that a certain Mr. Harrison was a well-known horse-breaker. The offense of the editor is that he wrote horse-breaker, which the plaintiff is by occupation.

A gentleman of Rochester saw an advertisement that a cure for dyspepsia might be had by sending a postage-stamp to the advertiser. He sent his stamp and the answer was, "Dig in your garden, and let whisky alone."

If a leaden bullet hits a man, what striking metamorphosis takes place?—The leaden bullet becomes fit.

CHAPTER XIV.

HOMELESS AMIDST A THOUSAND HOMES.

WHEN Robert Douglas walked away from the vicinity of Curzon Street he turned his steps in the direction of the Park; he walked quickly, as one who is spurred on by a pursuing pain—a pain which threatens to shrivel the soul with its sharpness, should its victim pause to think. When he relaxed his rapid pace it was to cast himself down on one of the park seats; and then he shielded his sun-burnt face with his hand that none might note its utter forlornness.

"She looked me in the face and she did not know me. She heard me speak and my voice was unfamiliar as a stranger's," he whispered. "Fool that I was to subject myself to this last humiliation!"

Two young lovers nestled down on a seat near him, and were telling each other of their passion's infiniteness, when they were disturbed by a harsh laugh resounding near them. They drew themselves away with scared, angry eyes, and Robert Douglas was left alone to stare at the red leaves fluttering slowly through the warm September haze, and to wonder whether this great City held a more desolate wretch than himself.

He was beginning to feel faint from hunger. His journey to town and the subsequent night's lodging had exhausted his last few shillings; and he had been unable to afford himself a meal for the last two days. He turned out his pockets and smiled drearily as he found that nothing but them from but a few dried crumbs, which, with great, impudent sparrows took immediate possession of. As it grew dusk the paths became deserted; the bands of children and nursery maids went and nearly all were leaving the Park. One kindly loiterer touched Douglas on the arm.

"It is getting late for sleeping in the air," he suggested.

"I am not sleeping, thank you," Douglas said, courteously, and the other passed on, thinking, "What a nice voice that tramp had!" In reality Douglas felt the drowsiness of exhaustion creeping over him, but he did not care to enter himself to leave his present position. He was at least secure of a seat here, and the City's multitudes repelled and became converted in him in sense of protection or comfort. "Who should know me there?" he thought. "What greater chins have I to dread? I remembered him as the man who broke up my life, and yet am I so dead in her memory that the sound of my voice does not even bring her to her?" It was strange that in all the various shapes her face had taken before him in his wanderings he had never pictured this one perfect unconsciousness. He had seen it gentle and scornful, quivering with passion, and cold as stone. He had seen it adherent with all its bright beauty thwarted by treachery. He had remembered its dishonour long smile turned to another, and turned to his guile, while his heart was sore with ruined love. He had forgiven it, and prayed that it might clear itself for him even the night had dropped to dust, and the poor sinning soul was called to hear its unchanging doom. He had once recalled it, fair and innocent, as it was when they first met as boy and girl. It was the recollection of her pure-seeming eyes—it was the sound of her childish voice, heard in a dream, that persuaded him to forgive her; but he never contemplated that the countenance he knew so well would cease to know him. He had once hoped to meet her face again; it was by the merest accident that he had rested by those arm-chairs, when a voice had given him the sweetest delight of his life, and who had caused him intolerable anguish, caused by him with the cruellest regard of a stranger. He cursed the necessity that had brought him to England, and the chance that had brought her before him. Her love was dead; but he was still vulnerable to mortification and outraged pride.

The glitter that stepped from the land of spirits to look once more on a dearly-loved face on earth, saw what caused it to veil its shadowy eyes, and to weep that eternal unpunished sin torture which might insure eternal forgetfulness. Surely the spirit's suffering was incomplete, for it only wrought remembrance. As we pass away and it might have presented itself in the flesh without being recognized by the fickle lover!

"What I to do—where am I to go?" Douglas asked himself, as he looked blankly into the gathering darkness. "There isn't a tramp in London who isn't better off than I am to-night. I don't even know the sheltered corners in the arches."

For two days he had tasted nothing but an unsavory roll at Folkestone, and his brain reeled when he endeavored to walk away from the loitering-place. He sank back wearily on the seat.

"It's no good; I must stay here till morning." He felt very weak and ill as he laid his head on the wooden bench.

"I wonder why He did not let me die, when all happiness left me. Why was I kept back in the wreck? and for what have I been reserved?" He lifted his large eyes wistfully to a misty galaxy of stars overhead, as if seeking there the answer to his question. Then he dropped to sleep in a shroud of mist, and with a rising wind shivering down the moist leaves on his face, and penetrating the thin worn cloak he had pulled tightly round him.

Lady Diana was smiling softly on her pillow at the reflection that bishops did not wear bonds any more gracefully than laymen, but were to the full as awkward and uncomfortable when confused by the tender trouble of love.

When Douglas next awoke the dawn was creeping up the east. The cold stillness of the night still held the town in check; it would be four or five hours before its gaudy babbling life poured down the long vistas of streets; before the shining quays would be thronged, the river shudder under the quick sails, or the pavement echo to the restless beat of innumerable footsteps.

Cramped and shivering, Douglas longed for the sun to grow warmer and the day to come in its completeness. There was a terrible pain gnawing his stomach, which he knew that unless he could quickly obtain the aid he had come to England to seek it would be too late for him to benefit by it. He asked himself if he was the only one man on whom he felt he had a claim, and had been told that "Captain Mowbray was out; was not expected home until late; would he call again to-morrow?" He consented to this, and had just left Thurstan Mowbray's lodging (which was very near Douglas's lodging to Curzon Street), when chance brought him before the object of his search. He knew Mowbray instantly, although it was a few years since they had met; but Thurstan, with his heart drunk with the joy of his approaching wedding with Lady Diana with his glance until she had disappeared within her doorway, and then he rode away with his eyes still full of her, never seeing the man who had once saved his life at the risk of his own.

"I must find him to-day, and get him to redeem an old promise," Douglas thought; then he remembered the look that had passed between Lady Diana and the young man, and smiled bitterly.

"The leopard can not change his spots, or the light woman her nature. I do not blame the boy, poor fool!"

As it grew later the Park became more frequented, and Robert Douglas's appearance soon attracted by a bevy of rosy-faced children running down to the shores of the water was to find myself (very much to my own surprise) alive at Fort Beaufort, and to learn that a troop of our own people had reached us just in time to prevent the final blow being given to my friend's head."

"It was grand!" Lord Clairveaux broke in. "Who was the fellow? A gentleman, I'll be bound."

"Yes, he must have been a thorough-bred—it was good form—very!" chimed in Carden, draining off his wine.

"Who was he?" "Is he alive still?" "Where is he?" the others cried, infected by Lord Clairveaux's enthusiasm.

"I thank God," Captain Mowbray said—his handsome face bright with the memory of what he had just done, "that he does live, and that I see him here now—a bit older, perhaps, but still the same man who set himself between me and what seemed certain death. Look here!"

Thurstan caught hold of Douglas's wrist, and, before the latter had time to resist his intention, pushed up the cotton sleeve, and, pulling forward the arm, cried,

"There's the scar of the first wound you got, Douglas. I never saw the last inflicted, for I was insensible when those black devils closed on you. This is the man who saved my life, Clairveaux. I've told you the way he did it."

"Will you honor me by shaking hands with me?" Lord Clairveaux said, turning his gleaming eyes on Douglas. "It is one of the shuckliest things I ever heard of."

"It is nothing to be proud of," Douglas answered, quietly, as he accepted the proffered courtesy. "I had no particular pleasure in my life, and was ready to risk it for the sake of a younger man who might have more than mere existence at stake."

"Say what you like, you won't get me to underrate what you did," said Mowbray. "Let us fill our glasses and drink Robert Douglas's health."

For a moment Captain Mowbray's guests forgot their reserve (even in little Mountjoy's breast the man got the better of the Guardsman), and cheered like noisy, fresh-hearted school-boys. No one wished to hold aloof now from the hagyard man whose bearing in his rough way, so incongruous with them in appearance, so grandly superior in experience.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE FRIENDS IN COUNCIL.

DOUGLAS was too fatigued to appreciate the rest he so much needed that night. All night long his slumbers were troubled; and he arose early, giving a sigh of relief as he opened his window and drew in breaths of fresh morning air. It was pleasant to see the gray still morning broadening into day, and to hear the active signs of life begin to echo down the streets. He was too restless to attempt to resume his slumbers; so he dressed, and went down into Captain Mowbray's sitting-room in search of a book to while away the hours until breakfast. It was the same room Thurstan and his friends had occupied after the dinner of the previous night. It hardly seemed a chamber likely to furnish interest or occupation for a studious mind. The scent of cigars still lingered in the muslin curtains; the centre-table was stained with fruit and covered with empty tumblers; errant papers had fallen on to the rugs, and there been immolated under men's heels; uncorked soda-water bottles rolled listlessly on the marble chiffonier, and cigarette nubes had burned white patches in the rose colored carpet. On the sofa, lying on a crumpled heap of sporting papers, was a little terrier, who kept one eye fixed on Douglas's movements with a wary scrutiny suggestive of sheriffs' officers. Dumb-bells and moogdars, single-sticks and bulbous-looking boxing-gloves, occupied the corners of the room; pipes-stands of favorite burlesque dancers were heaped in the card-dish, the confusion of legs somewhat resembling Doré's various illustrations to Dante where the soles of sinners protrude from the infernal lake. Queens of song smiled on the walls in juxtaposition to remarks of the turf. Patti looked blandly at Melbourne, and Melbourne smiled meditatively at his cat; a mahogany-colored portrait of Goodwood hung over the mantelpiece, and the crook of a hunting-whip clung for support to the slightly rounded arm of the Parisian Venus which stood on the shelf underneath the book-shelves. Douglas could find nothing but little prose literature in the room, except the Turf, heaped over the more solid shapes of Sponge's Sporting Tour, Handley Cross, Mannel of Cruelty, The Mysteries of Paris, and an odd volume of The Crescent and the Cross.

Douglas turned from these to look at a highly-finished colored lithograph of Epsom set in an open case on an adjacent table. It was a portrait of Captain Mowbray, and had been done for Lady Diana Mowbray, the lady's greatest desire. The pride which some savage tribes feel in collecting their enemies' scalps Lady Diana experienced in the accumulation of the portraits of those who had fallen victims to her charms. Douglas, all unconscious of the portrait's relationship, looked at it with interest. So his fatigue of body and mind on the previous evening had scarcely observed how much his host had altered since that hot day of peril on the Cape. He saw in this well-executed likeness how handsome Captain Mowbray had become in the years which had deepened the furrows on his own brow. Large, deep-colored brown eyes, crisp, short swarthy curls, ruggedly over a square, somewhat low forehead, a nose aquiline but delicate in outline, lips somewhat full, covered with a gold-brown mustache, a chin and throat round and firm as that of the Antinous—a figure in which power showed itself in graceful rather than in unwieldy outline; such was Thurstan Mowbray at the age of twenty-four.

"It is a fine thing to be young," Douglas thought, as he looked at the face which had youth's roundness in the chin and brow, youth's bloom in the shining eyes and dewy red lips. "The boy has grown older in beauty since I saw him fronting those black fellows with such determination on his boyish face, while years with me have deepened every uncouth trace of time and toil-worn hardening. Mowbray, it was admiring your portrait. I wonder if it is!"—for Captain Mowbray had just entered the room, and looked rather consciously at the photograph as he returned his friend's greeting.

"Yes; it is done by the particular wish of a friend of mine," he answered, quickly. "Will you come to breakfast, Douglas? after which we will come back here and have a smoke; there are no end of books and papers to talk to you about."

"In the first place," Thurstan began, when the two returned to the sitting-room, "let us make ourselves comfortable. In process of which objects he placed himself in an easy-chair, and his legs on the mantle-piece, put a cigar between his lips, and called to the terrier "to come and be cosseted."

Douglas sat by the open window, looking at his companion with that thoughtful, intent gaze which had for years past been his habitual expression.

"You said last night," Thurstan pursued, when the terrier had curled itself round in a ball on his knees, and the cigar was lighted to his satisfaction, "that you were going to give me a chance of being of use to you; and I wish you to understand that there is nothing in the world I wish to do for you if I have the power. So now go ahead."

"What I have to say is simple enough," the other answered. "I shall not tax your kindness very heavily, although I know I might do so with impunity. Is not your father a country gentleman?"

"He was," Thurstan admitted, "until the force of circumstances compelled him to go and live abroad."

"Do you often see him?"

"Not unless some place give you much leave, because of the Commander-in-Chief's annual breaking out in field-days; and in the winter I can't make up my mind to face the native foxes; but when the season is late and the fences blind, I generally contrive to get to Italy for a few days."

"It is through your father that I must chiefly hope to attain my object," Douglas said, "and I wish to live in some place or country where my manner of life will be as simple and retired as possible. I expect in a few days to receive a little money from an agent in London; it will not be more than enough to clothe me decently and to start me in a very humblest description; consequently I must adopt some means of supplying my wants in future. I want to take to a few pupils."

"Won't you let me—" Thurstan began, eagerly, his face flushing a little.

"No," Douglas answered, divining the meaning of the blush and hesitation. "My dear boy, you must remember that I am a Scotchman; and, as my old countryman Burns says, 'The pride we're verra grand.' It would be impossible for a Mer—for a Douglas, I mean, to live on his friends: you must help me my own way, or not at all."

"As you will," Thurstan said, rather vexed; "but C——— will always let me have an advance."

"At sixty per cent., you mean? I didn't save your father's life that you should be my harpies. What I wish is, that you should get your father to exert what influence he may yet retain near Austin to procure me a few pupils —public-school boys, whom I might prepare for the university."

Thurstan stared wonderingly at the speaker. "You a coach!" he muttered; "you don't look like it. And you won't let me help you in any other way?"

"I'm sorry if my appearance is against me," Douglas said, smiling; "but, indeed, care smile of his which lit up his face with an expression charm which was almost beauty: "you can help me in no other way."

"Would you not like to live in some more civilized place than Auriel?" suggested Captain Mowbrey. "I should think you not prefer some appointment in town?"

"No," Douglas answered, emphatically; "I should not. I have tried both. The life of the I have lived surrounded by the culture of civilization, and I have bivouacked where the gibberish of wild savagery was the only sound which broke the silence of the primeval solitudes; but I have never found a tiger-cat so cruel as a woman, nor any colony of malignants so base as a town mob. Since I have been in England I have felt more than ever what I have done for years. When I was abroad I used to dream of those that loved me brightly at me; of voices that welcomed me back home, and I wondered why I remained away. I was dissevered from all the old social ties until I returned to a world where I am as one dead. If I lived in London I should be in my own country. Never ask me to come back to London. Peace is what I seek; and I shall find it best in some quiet country house, where I can write the story of my life to literary pursuits. I shall hope to increase my income by my writings. I should have lived abroad a few years longer to finish my work on Brazilian forests, but I found my money and health failing me, so I brought my notes home with me; and these, and similar memoranda on other subjects, will assist me considerably in my task. I have by no means spent it, Mowbray, this is the only sort of life I shall find tolerable to me."

"If you must put music," Thurstan Mowbray said; "but I should think you would find it awfully slow. I will write to my father to-day, and at the same time I wouldn't advise you to produce me as a show pupil. Do you remember how, at the Cape, I used to write spooney notes to the brigadier's daughter, and cause to you to know if I was to spell eternal with one 'l?' I'll look out an offensive, but I haven't forgotten how to spell eternal. Will you, remind me, Douglas, I want to ask your advice."

"About spelling?"

"Oh no; I always carry a pocket-dictionary about with me now; but it is about a letter that took here."

Captain Mowbray drew a small, delicately-tinted photograph from his breast pocket as he spoke and handed it to his friend.

"Well!" he said, impatiently, after a few moments' silence, "what do you think of it?" He looked at Douglas's face, anxious to read there the sympathetic admiration he sought; but the latter was covering his eyes with one hand to shield them from the glare of the sun.

"She is very pretty."

"She is more than pretty," Thurstan answered, with some impatience: "She is the loveliest creature I ever saw."

"What is she?"

"She is the lady those fellows were speaking of last night, Lady Diana Merton. She is a widow, you know."

"No, I did not know," Douglas said, quietly. "Who was her husband?"

"Oh! he died years ago, and a good thing too. I do not think she was very happy with him."

"It is his fault?" Douglas asked, with a touch of bitterness in his voice.

"She says so. He was a hard-headed Scotchman, given to drinking, older than herself, and unwilling to make allowances for the freaks of a pretty, spoiled child. Besides, he was very learned, and she says she knows books wrong."

"So she has come to you for contrast," Douglas suggested, a little maliciously.

"I think, you know," Thurstan hesitated now puffing vigorously at his cigar, "that—as she really likes me, you know, better than she ever did the old fellow."

"Then I am to congratulate you?"

An indescribable expression passed over Douglas's face as he asked which Thurstan, occupied by his cigar and his embarrassment, did not notice.

"Well—so, not exactly," the latter said, ruefully. "The fact is, whenever I press for some decided answer—since I left her that I wish to make my life hers, and that—"

"Excuse the interruption: but what are your prospects?"

"They lie in a nutshell," Thurstan admitted. "The Queen's pay and an allowance of three hundred pounds, which we are annum. I can't offer her my commission—that's mortgaged."

"And how much do you suppose you own?"

"Somewhere about fifteen thousand pounds."

"Is Lady Diana aware of your circumstances?" Douglas asked, fixing his keen eyes on the youngger man's face.

"Yes; but that makes no difference. She is not mercenary."

"Has she ever given her any presents?" Douglas said, carelessly.

"Only a bracelet or two set with brilliants, and a locket containing my hair. The locket was the most valuable, and it only cost a hundred and fifty pounds. She said she would never part with it."

"I once he sworn she was," Robert Douglas remarked, with a grim smile. "And are you quite sure that she is sincere with you?"

"No man but yourself should put such a question," Thurstan said, with a hot gleam of anger in his brown eyes.

"I beg your pardon," Douglas answered, meekly. "I am certain that there is no woman like her."

"She has one fault," Thurstan admitted, mollified by his friend's apology. "She won't let me speak out. When I'm with her she nearly drives me mad. I want to tell her what I feel. The words rush hotly up from my heart to my lips, and then, just as I summon up courage to bear the sound of my own voice, she gives me her pretty hand to kiss, or sends me veil by bringing her pink lips and sweet eyes close to my face, saying, with an innocent air of meditation, 'Of what are you thinking?' And then—'Hallo! Douglas, what are you about?'"

For Robert Douglas had accidentally upset the small table on which he leaned, and with it a large bottle of ink, which sent quicksilver-like rivulets of sweet flowing under the ball-rosewire's feet, causing him to lift up his milk-white toes with a look of intense disgust.

"I beg your pardon," he suppose I moved too suddenly. What sort of advice is it you require of me?"

"The best you can give."

"My advice is, then, that you should insist on having some definite answer."

"I am sure not to be able to get it out when it comes to the point. I had better write it," Captain Mowbray said, thoughtfully. "She is going down to her Brighton house to-morrow. I will write first, and then follow my letter down; but I shall say nothing of this to-day. I am going to call on her. My home is at the door. Will you excuse me a little while, Douglas?"

"Certainly."

"Then good-by until dinner-time."

"Good-by."

Captain Mowbray turned round when he got to the door.

"You don't know how beautiful she is, Douglas," he said, enthusiastically, "nor how good."

"No, I do not," Douglas replied, dryly, and the door closed on the departing lover.

THE REVOLUTION IN HAVANA.

The Cuban revolution reached an important crisis when Captain-General DULCE was compelled by the Spanish Volunteers to relinquish his command. The Volunteers had been for a long time dissatisfied with the Administration. Under the pressure of this influence DULCE tendered his resignation through a telegram to Madrid, stating, at the same time, that his action was compelled by force. The Spanish Provisional Government at once appointed CABALLERO DE RODAS; and it was supposed that DULCE would remain until the arrival of his successor. But he did not remain. Last after his resignation he ordered DON GONZALO CASTAÑON, editor of La Voz de Cuba, to leave the island. This displeased the Volunteers, who immediately took measures to secure the revocation of the order. Their demands were granted. Just at this time General PALEZ arrived from the field of operations in the interior. This officer was accused of making money out of the troubles of his country, and he took refuge on board the iron-clad Victoria.

The Volunteers were determined to have the head of PALEZ. They gathered in the plaza, and DULCE was obliged to send for the cavalry, the guardia civil, and a guard of marines for his personal safety. But the Volunteers held their ground, forced the resignation of DULCE, removed the governors of Cardenas and Colon, and at the present time, through their Committee, rule the Spanish portion of the island. DON F. G. ROMERO DE LA PEÑA is the plaza DULCE upon the resignation of the latter. PELAEZ, however, escaped. Our illustration on page 404 represents the scene of Volunteers gathered in front of the Captain-General's palace on the evening of June 1. They demanded that DULCE should deliver PELAEZ or resign his command. The first condition he would not submit to, and he protested against the second, but in vain. He was forced to abandon the island. What the result of this émeute in Havana may be, as affecting the suppression of the Cuban insurrection, it is impossible now to say.

CLASS RINGS.

THIS year the graduating classes both of the Annapolis Naval Academy and of the Military Academy at West Point have procured class-rings. That being designed for the West Point class of 1869 was made by TIFFANY & CO., of this city; that for the Annapolis class was made by BALL & BLACK, also of this city. The accompanying cut shows the design of each. These rings cost each about $40, and are intended to answer as a sort of distinctive class badge.

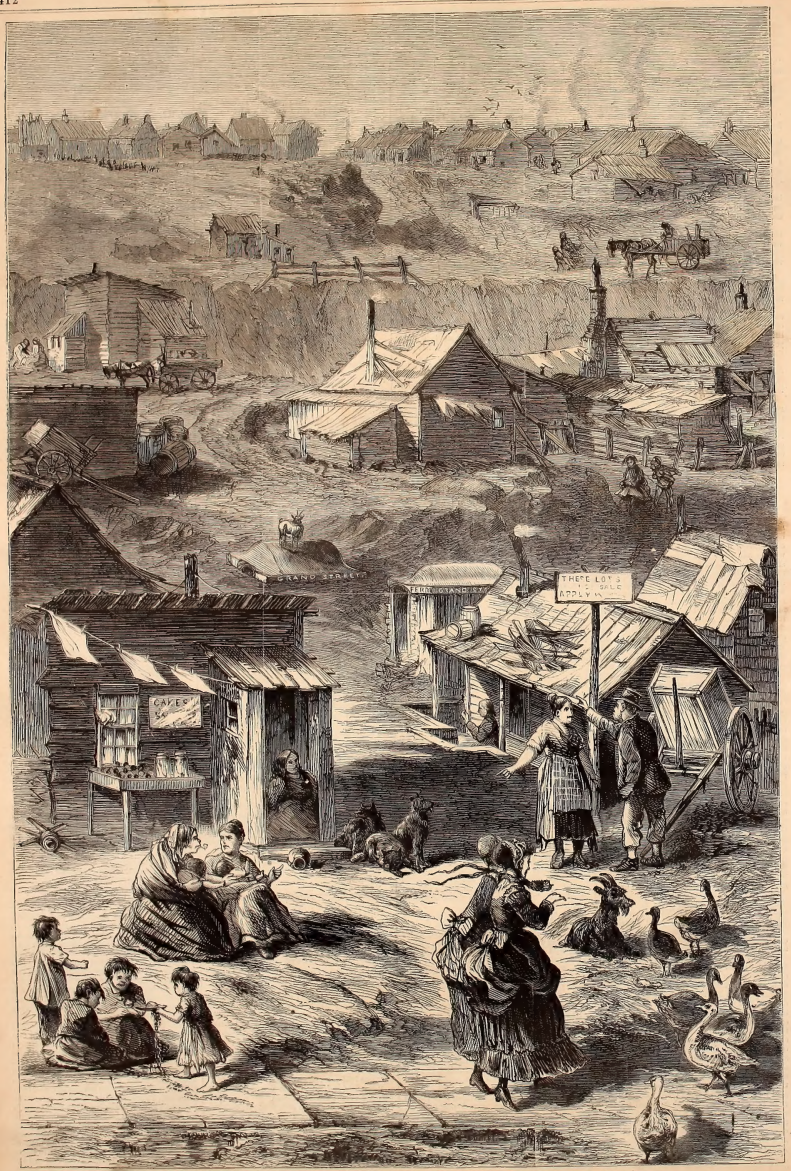
PEACE JUBILEE, BOSTON

WE give this week a double-page view representing the interior of the grand Coliseum, used for the Peace Jubilee in Boston. This building will hold 50,000 people, which is nearly twice the capacity of the largest amphitheatres in ancient Rome and Athens.

Our illustration is from a splendid photograph by JOHN A. WHIPPLE, of Boston. This artist, who has for twenty years had a national reputation for the excellence of his photographic portraits, has here shown, in a view which for perspective could never be surpassed, the possibilities of his art for the perfect representation of the vast interiors of public buildings. Among the many attractions of Boston for the thousands of visitors during the jubilee week, perhaps none will will prove of greater interest than MR. WHIPPLE'S immense and commodious establishment at 297 Washington Street. MR. WHIPPLE was the first to successfully introduce photography into this country, and the surprising progress of this art is no small measure owing to his enterprising study and labor.

The Peace Jubilee in Boston is an important national event. It is not only the grandest musical exhibition ever given in the world's history; it is the consummation of all the musical progress to the entire country after years of intestine conflict and civil commotion. It is an occasion which does honor to all of the men engaged in planning and carrying out the enterprise—to MR. GILMORE, its originator; to the musical associations who have voluntarily offered their valuable assistance to secure its success; to the committees in charge, who have made the fullest possible arrangements for the comfort and entertainment of visitors; and to the municipal authorities of Boston, who have done so much to insure facility of transportation by the city railway lines, and to provide the Coliseum with water by the extension of their water-pipes.



THE SQUATTERS OF NEW YORK—SCENE NEAR CENTRAL PARK.—[SKETCHED BY D. E. WYAND.]

NOT "LOVE," BUT JUSTICE.

FROM LONDON PUNCH, MAY 29, 1869.

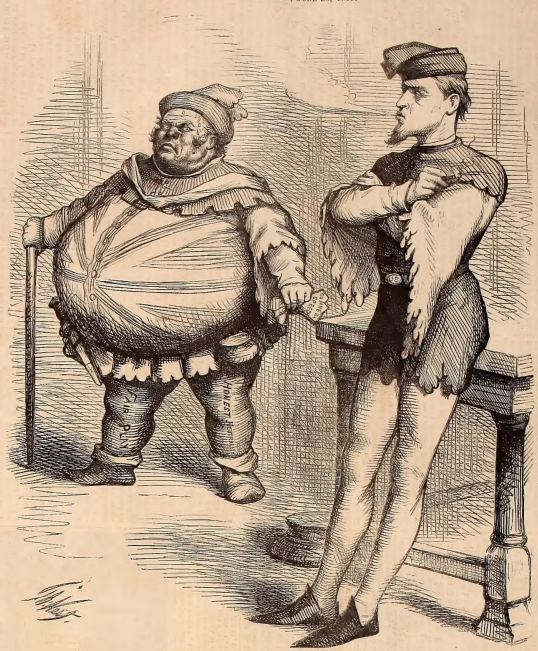
SIR JONATHAN FALSTAFF.

PRINCE OF WALES. "SIRRAH, DO I OWE YOU A THOUSAND POUND?"
SIR JONATHAN. "A THOUSAND POUND, AL'?—FOUR HUNDRED MILLION! THY LOVE IS WORTH FOUR HUNDRED MILLION: THOU OWEST ME THY LOVE."—SHAKSPEARE (slightly altered).

HARPER'S WEEKLY, JUNE 26, 1869.



SIR JOHN BULL FALSTAFF.

PRINCE JONATHAN. "HERE COMES LEAN JACK; HERE COMES BAREBONES! HOW NOW, MY SWEET CREATURE OF BOMBAST? HOW LONG IS'T AGO, JACK, SINCE THOU SAW'ST THINE OWN KNEE?"—SHAKSPEARE (not altered).

LEGEND IN ALSACE.

Know'st thou, Gretchen, how it happens
That the dear ones die?
God walks daily in his garden
While the sun shines high:
In that garden there are roses
Beautiful and bright,
And he gazes round delighted
With the lovely sight:
If he marks one gayly blooming,
Than the rest more fair,
He will smile, and look upon it,
Full of tender care:
And the beauteous rose he gathers
In his bosom lies
But on earth are tears and sorrow,
For a dear one dies!

HOW NATIVE AUSTRALIANS SECURE WIVES.

In that very entertaining book, "The Wedding-day in All Ages and Countries," just published by Messrs. Harper & Brothers, which is replete with curious information, is found the following account of the marriage customs of the Australesians, which must be novel to most of our readers:

In New Zealand, the Fejiee, and other islands of the Pacific, the custom of capture of women for wives has prevailed from the earliest times of the known history of those places. The native Australians also practiced the system of capturing their brides, and their primitive usages make frequent allusion to the custom. Turnbull, writing in 1805, says that, among the Australians, "when a man or a woman be liked he told her to follow him, and if she refused he forced her to accompany him by blows, cutting by knocking her down and carrying her off." Sir George Grey, writing in 1841 of the Northwestern Australians, says: "Even supposing a woman to be under no engagement to her admirers, many plots are always laid to carry her off, and in the contests which result from them she is almost certain to receive some violent injury, for each of the combatants orders her to follow him, and in the event of her refusing throws a spear at her. The early life of a young woman at all celebrated for beauty is generally one continued series of captivity to different masters, of ghastly wounds, of wanderings in strange families, of rapid flights, of bad treatment from other females, among whom she is brought a stranger by her captor; and rarely do you see a form of unusual grace and elegance but it is marked and scarred by the furrows of old wounds; and many a female thus wandered several hundred miles from the home of her infancy, having carried successively to distant and more distant points."

A writer in 1864 says of the Australian blacks: "Courting, as the professor of marriage, is unknown among them. When a young warrior is desirous of procuring a wife he generally obtains one by giving in exchange for her a sister or some other female relative of his own; but if there should happen to be no eligible female disengaged in the tribe to which he belongs, then he hovers around the encampment of some other blacks until he gets an opportunity of seizing one of their cubans, whom perhaps he has seen and admired when attending one of the general corroborees. His mode of making his addresses is simple and efficacious. With a blow of his nulla-nulla (war-club) he stuns the object of his affections, and then rings her insensible body away to some retired spot, whence, as soon as she recovers her senses, he brings her home to his own gunyah in triumph. Sometimes two join in an expedition for the same purpose, and then for several days they watch the movements of their intended victims, using the utmost skill in concealing their presence. When they have obtained the knowledge they require they wait for a dark, windy night; then, quite naked, and carrying only their long 'gispeares,' they stealthily thread through the bush until they reach the immediate vicinity of the camp-fires, in front of which the girls they are in search of are sleeping. Slowly and silently they creep close enough to distinguish the figure of one of those cubans; then one of the intruders stretches out his spear, and inserts the barbed point among her thick, flowing locks; turning the spear slowly round, some of the hair speedily becomes entangled with it; then, with a sudden jerk, she is aroused from her slumber, and as her cries ring out on the night air one of the other weapon pressed against her throat. She neither faints nor screams; she knows well that the slightest struggle or escape on her part will cause her instant death; so, like a sensible woman, she makes a virtue of necessity, and rising silently she follows her captors. They lead her away to a considerable distance, tie her to a tree, and return to examine their other victim in like manner. Then, when they have accomplished their design, they hurry off to their own camp, where they are received with universal applause, and highly honored for their gallant exploit. Occasionally an alarm is given, but even then the intruders easily escape amidst the confusion, to renew their attempt at some future period. When a distinguished warrior carries off a lubra from a strange tribe he will frequently volunteer to undergo 'the trial of the spears,' in order to prevent the necessity of his people going to war in his defense; then both the tribes meet, and ten of their smartest and strongest young men are picked out by the aggrieved party. These are each provided with three reed-spears and a womera, or throwing-stick; and the champions armed only with his bellima (a bark shield eighteen inches long by six wide), is led out in front, and placed at the distance of forty yards. Then, at a given signal, the thirty spears are launched at him in rapid succession; these he receives and parries with his shield, and so skillful are the blacks in the use of their own weapons that very seldom is any wound inflicted. Having successfully passed through this ordeal the warrior is considered to have fairly earned his cubra, and to have atoned for his offense in carrying her off; so the ceremony generally concludes with the two tribes feasting together in perfect harmony."

The native Australian women are all usually betrothed immediately after birth, the men of a different tribe to their own; so that all women are wives: and the stealing of them leads to continual warfare between the tribes. No woman can be betrothed to a man of her own stock.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

ONE half of the entire population of New York city are said to dwell in tenement-houses, and the many wretched underground cellars are homes for many thousands—if such desolate holes can be ostentatious names. Enormous rents are exacted from these for unventilated, inconvenient, dark, damp rooms. Any method of counteracting buildings, which will tend to ameliorate the condition of the poorer classes in this respect will be a blessing to them; and we are glad to learn that such tenements are being tried with this end in view. A model tenement-house has been built by Mr. Thomas W. Lowry, of this city, which promises to be a complete success, both in a benevolent and in a financial aspect. The building is on West Thirty-second street, between Sixth and Seventh, and contains forty distinct tenements, each accommodating a family of average size in comfortable style. Water and gas are carried through the building; and a janitress has charge of the door, keeping the halls in proper order, and one of the general wants of the tenants. The system is not unlike that so common in Paris, of providing for apartment upon the ordinary way of managing tenementhouses, and is found to be a good investment for the landlord.

West Point was last week crowded with fashionables who went thither to—blow themselves, and to see the cadets and the President. Thursday was the day the President was expected, but a most uncomfortable day it proved—and Thursday was the day the visitors to the Point not only were dump and chilly, but disagreeable also; for in consequence of an accident to the train on the Hudson River Grand traveled from Washington he did not arrive at West Point until evening. Every body had therefore leaped, and not a few complaints were uttered: and when news of the accident was circulated, and the escape of the President was known, the fault-finaining changed to thoughtfulness. Friday was a glorious day. With the cadets there was the cavalry drill; by way of the examination of the gorgeous display of fire-works in the evening; with the President and Cabinet there was the grand dinner traveled from Washington he did not arrive at West Point until evening. Every body had therefore leaped, and not a few complaints were uttered: and when news of the accident was circulated, and the escape of the President was known, the fault-finaining changed to thoughtfulness. Now that the "heated term" may be at any time expected the luxury of public baths will be appreciated by many. The tax was in this city, as passed by the last Legislature, appropriated $50,000 for the purpose of erecting and maintaining public baths for the use of the people at large. The money is to be made to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, who have control of the wharves and piers of the city, for two piers, one upon the East and the other upon the North River, to be set apart for the purposes of these baths. The building is to contain not more than two baths immediately, so that they may be in readiness for use at an early day.

A statue of Humboldt, modeled by Professor Bissener, of Berlin, is to be erected in Central Park next September. The Park has already some fine specimens of art, and very rare additions are being made. Indeed the citizens of New York may well be proud of this beautiful pleasure-ground, so well laid out, and outstanding so many artistic structures. Very convenient arrangements have recently been made for visitors to use the Park by means of omnibuses and by a private carriage. A new kind of carriage, accommodating twelve persons, has been put on the road: one can make the round trip of the Park for the moderate sum of twenty-five cents.

In the Freshman class of the Cornell University there are this year two students from England, one from Russia, and one from Brazil. This institution promises to take a high rank in a short time. During the present term George William Curtis has been lecturing upon "Recent English Literature," and James Russell Lowell on "Early English Literature."

Professor Bunsen, of Heidelberg, recently met with a serious accident. He was engaged in the preparation of pure rhodium, when the explosion of the carelessness of an attendant, a fearful explosion occurred, by which the eyes of Bunsen were severely burned. As soon as he had recovered from the unconsciousness following the accident, his first words were: "Let some one write to Mr. Grove about the floor and save it." Some years ago Professor Bunsen lost the sight of one eye by a similar explosion. It was feared that the remaining eye had been destroyed by this last accident; but the physician expressed the hope that the injury was not irremediable. "In writing this the hero of science exclaimed, "Thank God! I can now perceive with the left eye the outline of the metal when it blew up." But the injury is very serious, and it will be a long time before he will be able to resume his scientific labors.

Saratoga, Niagara, the Adirondacks, the White Mountains, and all hitherto famous summer resorts are quite thrown into the shade by the very idea of a summer excursion to the Arctic regions! Mr. William Bradford, an artist who considers that this country have been greatly admired, is about to undertake a second trip up among the icebergs. He has chartered a schooner-rig at St. John, Newfoundland, engaged two skilful photographers, and is ready to take a limited number of passengers with him. Every body will wish they had gone when the "heated term" comes on!

The Courrier de San Francisco uses a French invention, known as the Lenoir engine, as a motive power in running the press upon which that paper is printed. The machine resembles the ordinary steam-engine, but is more bulky, having two cylinders—one for the introduction of gas, and one for air (each being six wide), is led out in front, and placed at the distance of forty yards. Then, at a given signal, the thirty spears are launched at him in rapid succession; these he receives and parries with his shield, and so skillful are the blacks in the use of their own weapons that very seldom is any wound inflicted. FIVE ACRES TOO MUCH.

A Truthful Elucidation of the Attractions of the Country, and a Careful Consideration of the Question of Profit and Loss as Invested in Amateur Farming, with much Valuable Advice and Instruction to those about Purchasing Large or Small Pieces in the Rural Districts.

By ROBERT B. ROOSEVELT,

Author of "Game Fish of North America," "Superior Fishing," "Game Birds," &c.

WITH CHARACTERISTIC ILLUSTRATIONS.

12MO, CLOTH, $1 50.

"MR. ROOSEVELT, instead of growing misanthropical because his farm yielded him eggs at the cost of a dollar each, and corn at the rate of fifty cents an ear, has good-naturedly published his farming experience as an immense practical joke, and has written the history of his Five Acres as a joyous warning to those contemplating farming.

"He has a singularly acute sense of the humorous, and the present volume will give the author the well-deserved reputation of being decidedly the sharpest, and brightest, and most thoroughly original humorist of the day. As a book of side-splitting fun he has never been teased, and its unquestionable truth imparts a peculiarly sly flavor to its pages. The illustrations are by no means unworthy of the text, which is the highest praise that could be given to them."

THE COLLINS

WATCH FACTORY

The Collins Metal and Jewelry Factory has removed from 37 Nassau Street to their splendid New Offices,

No. 335 BROADWAY.

These superior Watches have now been in use four years, and give universal satisfaction; are guaranteed in accuracy, and are now manufactured in quantity and for time by gold ones costing $150 and $200. They have been greatly improved, but the price remains the same, $15. Those of extra fine finish, 20s. Gents' and Ladies' sizes. A supply of the richest styles, in every respect equal to the Rome gold, at one-sixth the price. We have also and are not responsible for the bogus and worthless goods sent by jewelry establishments. Our Factory is the ONLY PLACE where the Genuine Collins Metal Watches and Jewelry can be had.

WORDS OF WEIGHT

FOR Wives and Mothers.

The superiority of

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters

over all other tonics and correctives, as a remedy for dyspepsia, biliousness, nervous affections, and all complaints of the visceral organs, and as a preventive of malarious disorders, is proverbial; but perhaps it is not so generally known that the ingredients of this famous invigorant and alterative exercise a powerful and most beneficial influence in that numerous and distressing class of ailments of which so many thousands of delicate women are the patient, uncomplaining victims. The special troubles of the sex, commencing with the dawn of womanhood and extending over a period of from thirty to thirty-five years, are as readily and certainly relieved by the operation of this admirable vegetable preparation as any of the complaints common to both sexes for which it is recommended as a specific. The attention of mothers is invited to its influence in those peculiar cases of functional irregularity and irritation, which, when neglected or maltreated, destroy the health and shorten the lives of so many invalids. There is no need for the powerful and dangerous drugs too often resorted to in such cases. The mild but effectual assistance of the BITTERS is all the assistance that nature requires in its struggle to overcome the difficulty, and a vast amount of suffering would be spared to the sex if they placed implicit faith in this wholesome vegetable invigorant, corrective, and tonic, and rejected the pernicious nostrums advertised by ignorant and mercenary charlatans.

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. In quality and resemblance to Gold are such that even judges have been deceived. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only set forth the claims of science in the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition.

The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and all these cases are manufactured in my own factory. I am enabled to warrant them as excellent time-keepers.

Price now $16 to $32.

HITCHCOCK'S

DIME MUSIC.

In presenting to a generous and appreciative public this new series, we feel that we are more fully meeting the popular demand for select music at a low price.

By generously compensating Authors, and thereby to stimulate native talent, is a cardinal feature of our undertaking: while to place upon the Piano rich gems, requiring more space than the Half-Dime Series affords, induces the inauguration of the Dime Series, which it is believed will accomplish both of these aims.

The abundant success which has crowned the advent of the Half-Dime Series removes any hesitancy we might have felt in placing this new series before the public. Both will be published weekly, and the numbers multiplied rapidly as possible. Parents can rest assured that, in future as in past, our publications will be scrupulously free from any thing that has an immoral or hurtful tendency, so that the one who subscribe for the numbers so long, will find nothing to offend even the most fastidious taste. The following are

NOW READY:

Nos. 1. Ayrel Chorus.
2. My Soul to God, my Heart to Thee.
3. Wedding March.
4. It is better to Laugh.
5. Orphee Aux Enfers Galop.
6. Sleep well, Sweet Angel.
7. The Delhi Galop.
8. Nelly Grey.

The above can be obtained of Music and Periodical dealers generally. Mailed (postpaid) on receipt of price, TEN CENTS each.

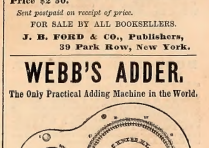
WEBB'S ADDER.

The Only Practical Adding Machine in the World.



This little machine gives instantaneous additions where numbers are called off. It carries up the columns of a ledger account, two at a time, with mechanical accuracy. It has the endorsement of all who have seen or used it. New testimonials will be published next week.

"By its use a column of figures of any length or size can be added up with an accuracy and ease seldom attained by the most rapid or most careful mathematician."—H. Fisher, Jr., Sec. A. Low & Bros., 31 Burling Slip. "Makes adding a pleasure, and is a great brain saver."—Gunning Wyman, Secretary, Phœnix Fire Insurance Company, No. 173 Broadway.

The machine is guaranteed to do every thing claimed for it. Price, $6, $8, and $10. To those likely to keep a machine in constant use, the $8 or $10 machine is recommended. Sent by mail on receipt of price and postage (75 cents), or by express, C. O. D., at the customer's expense. To remit saves return-money charge. Send Money Order, Registered Letter, or Draft. HENRY J. RAYMOND.

On Friday, June 18, we were startled by the sad intelligence of the death of HENRY JARVIS RAYMOND, the founder and editor of the New York Times. He had died suddenly that morning of apoplexy. Thus passed away in the prime of life—for he was only in his fiftieth year—one of the four most eminent journalists in this country, and also one of the most prominent politicians of this State.

HENRY JARVIS RAYMOND was born in the village of Lima, Livingston County, New York, January 24, 1820. His father, who died only a few months since, was a hard-working farmer of moderate means and of sound integrity. His mother—a woman of strong character—encouraged his early tendencies toward a life of study. After a short period of education in the district school during the winters of his boyhood years, he continued his studies at the village academy, and in 1833 commenced Latin and Algebra at the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary. He entered the University of Vermont in the summer of 1836, and there was graduated in 1840 with the highest honors of his class.

The youth of twenty then came to New York city, where he entered upon the study of law in the office of Mr. E. W. MARSH. But he had his living to earn, and the only prominent men of the city with whom he was at all acquainted were Mr. MANN, then a law-student in Wall Street, and HORACE GREELEY, then the proprietor of the New Yorker, a weekly newspaper, to which Mr. RAYMOND had contributed during his college course. He still wrote for that paper, and also earned $5 a week by daily news-letters to the Cincinnati Chronicle, then edited by E. D. MANSFIELD, since known as the "Veteran Observer." Meantime he received an offer of a school in North Carolina at $400 a year: but as Mr. GREELEY offered him the same for his services on the New Yorker he declined the first offer, and remained in New York.

In 1841 Mr. GREELEY established the Tribune, and retained Mr. RAYMOND'S services as assistant editor. In this position he demonstrated his ability as a journalist. No one could make so rapid or so accurate a report of a speech; and he was also equally prepared to write a leading editorial. Whatever he did he did well. His report of WEBSTER'S speech at Bunker Hill was a memorable event in those days when short-hand writing was unknown.

Mr. RAYMOND accepted an editorial position on the New York Courier and Enquirer in 1843. It was in this paper that his part of the celebrated controversy with Mr. GREELEY on the doctrine of Fourierism was published. It was during his connection with this journal that he became a reader in the publishing-house of HARPER & BROTHERS, a position which he held for ten years.

Mr. RAYMOND'S political life began in 1849, when he was elected a member of the New York State Assembly by the Whigs. He was re-elected the next year, and was chosen speaker. In 1851 he started the Times newspaper. In 1852 he went to the Baltimore Convention to report the proceedings for his paper, but was given a seat as a delegate, and made an eloquent speech in exposition of Northern sentiment. In 1854 he was elected Lieutenant-Governor of this State, receiving 157,166 votes, a majority of 28,333 over LUDLOW, his principal opponent. As an organizer of the Republican party Mr. RAYMOND was an active worker. The "Address to the People," which was issued from Pittsburg in 1856, was from his pen. He was a supporter of FREMONT after the meeting of the first National Convention. In 1857 he refused to be a candidate for Governor of this State. The next four years were devoted to his profession. In 1858 he sided, apparently, with the supporters of Mr. DOUGLAS, but in the end resumed his relations with the Republican party. In 1860 he was a warm supporter of Mr. SEWARD for the Republican nomination, and he was peculiarly satisfied that Mr. SEWARD was placed in the Cabinet of Mr. LINCOLN.

In 1861 Mr. RAYMOND was again elected to the Assembly and was chosen Speaker. In 1864 he was elected to the United States House of Representatives from the Sixth District of this city. His career in that body, during a critical era of our political history, will be reviewed in another column.

His speech on the 29th of January, 1866, was his first elaborate effort in Congress. It was upon the Fourteenth Constitutional Amendment. In concluding this speech Mr. RAYMOND thus expressed his views as to what the Government ought to do:

"In the first place, I think we ought to accept the present status of the Southern States, and regard them as having resumed, under the President's guidance and action, their functions of self-government in the Union. In the second place, I think this House should decide on the admission of Representatives by districts, admitting none but loyal men who can take the oath we may prescribe, and holding all others as disqualified: the Senate acting, at its discretion, in the same way in regard to Representatives of States. I think, in the third place, we should provide by law for giving to the freedmen of the South all the rights of citizens in courts of law and elsewhere. In the fourth place, I would exclude from Federal office the leading actors in the conspiracy which led to the rebellion in every State. In the fifth place, I would make such amendments to the Constitution as may seem wise to Congress and the States, acting freely and without coercion. And, sixth, I would take such measures and precautions, by the disposition of military forces, as will preserve order and prevent the overthrow, by usurpation or otherwise, in any State, of its republican form of government.....Above all, I beg this House to bear in mind, as the sentiment that should control and guide its action, that we of the North and they of the South are at war no longer. The gigantic contest is at an end. The courage and devotion on either side which made it so terrible and so long no longer owe a divided duty, but have become the common property of the American name, the priceless possession of the American Republic through all time to come. The dead of the contending hosts sleep beneath the soil of a common country and under one common flag. Their hostilities are hushed, and they are the dead of the nation for evermore. The victor may well exult in the victory he has achieved. Let it be our task, as it will be our highest glory, to make the vanquished, and their posterity to the latest generation, rejoice in their defeat."

On the expiration of his term Mr. RAYMOND, having declined the renomination that was pressed upon him by prominent men of both parties, withdrew almost wholly from public life, and devoted all his energies to the conduct of his paper. He was offered the Mission to Austria by President JOHNSON in 1867; but his name was sent to the Senate without his consent, and after he had notified the President that no considerations could induce him to accept the position. The last article written by Mr. RAYMOND for the Times was an editorial on Mr. SEWARD, which appeared on the morning of June 17.

"A remarkable instance of Mr. RAYMOND'S working ability," says the New York Tribune, in an obituary sketch, "occurred on the occasion of the death of DANIEL WEBSTER, a statesman for whom he had the greatest admiration. The news of Mr. WEBSTER'S death reached here on a Saturday afternoon. Mr. RAYMOND wrote an admirable biography, which appeared in Monday's paper, covering twenty-six columns of the Times, and in addition he wrote three columns of editorial on the same subject. Of this extraordinary biography Mr. RAYMOND wrote sixteen columns without stopping a moment for rest. As a feat of editorial labor we doubt its ever having been equaled."

Mr. RAYMOND passed the afternoon previous to his death in Greenwood, making arrangements for the interment of his son WALTER'S remains, and called at the office of the Times about six o'clock in the evening. After a few minutes' talk on matters pertaining to the business of the paper he returned home. After dinner he sat with his family and some friends who came in until between nine and ten o'clock, when he left them to attend a political consultation; and his family saw no more of him until he was discovered, about half past two next morning, lying in the hall-way unconscious and apparently dying. He had locked the outside door and shut the inner one, and was then apparently stricken with the malady that closed his life. The most eminent medical aid was at once summoned, and the utmost that science and skill could do were done, in vain. He remained unconscious, and died tranquilly about five o'clock in the morning.

Soon after leaving college Mr. RAYMOND married a most estimable lady, whose acquaintance he had made in Vermont. By her he had several children, of whom a son, who graduated recently from Yale College, and two daughters, we believe, are now living. His wife is at present in Europe, where one of his daughters is being educated, and we understand that he was to have visited them this summer. As a husband and father he was kind and affectionate.

THE CALM.

FOR the first time within this generation there is political peace in the country. The most vital debate in our history, which in its progress became the most sanguinary civil war, has ended in the absolute triumph of the party that held the true American doctrine of equal liberty, the party of humanity, justice, and civilization. Indeed, fierce as the struggle was, involving private griefs too deep and sore ever to be wholly assuaged until the lapse of many years, the advantage to the cause was worth it all; and it is impossible even now to think without dismay of the issue of the contest that was sought by the present opposition. The Republican party was organized as a national election in 1856, when the Democratic party was apparently immovably intrenched in power, and when the Administration seemed almost complete. In 1860 the Republican party succeeded upon the question of the non-extension of Slavery. In 1864 it succeeded upon the issue of Emancipation and unconditional suppression of the rebellion. In 1868 it again succeeded upon the question of a Reconstruction policy adapted to secure the national victory.

The Fifteenth Amendment, which guarantees equality of suffrage, and which strikes color out of politics, is the formal end of the party strife of many years, and it is undoubtedly to be adopted. There is, therefore, at this moment no domestic political question upon which parties divide. The Democratic party returns to our politics, whose organization is known as the Democratic party, of course continues to assert an reconstruction and the policy of equal rights; but it has not undertaken to open reconstruction as a practical issue. Upon the financial question there are as many theories as talkers on the subject; but there is no distinctive policy known as Republican and Democratic. Republicans are not agreed in praise or blame of the Secretary's present course, and Democrats condemn and approve it while denouncing taxation and revenue swindling, without proposing any system of improvement, or any change whatever except their own return to power. Neither party, as such, is a Protective or Free-Trade party.

If the Republican party were to hold a convention to-morrow it could congratulate the country upon the return of peace; upon equal suffrage; upon the long roll of illustrious and disinterested services which the party has rendered to the public welfare; upon the honesty and economy which it is its aim to introduce into the administration of the government, and of which the character of the President and his Cabinet is the surest guarantee. It would declare its sympathy with all people struggling for liberty, and that the difference between England must be settled consistently with the evident justice of the American feeling upon the subject. If the Democratic party were to hold a convention it could not accuse the Republicans of delaying and embittering reconstruction; of aiming to destroy the local self-government, which is an ancient bulwark of freedom; of plunging the country into a frightful debt, and of providing for its payment the most unjust, onerous, and partially administered system of taxation; of wantonly and wickedly economy and a reduction of burdens; assert the failure of the new Administration; and pronounce for the independence of Cuba and for summary measures with Great Britain.

Under the circumstances every intelligent voter would ask himself whether, in the absence of any immediate issue upon which he must support one of the parties, there were any reason to suppose that the general administration of affairs would be more honest and judicious if the dominant party were overthrown. Indeed, unless something wholly unforeseen occurs during the next two or three months, that is the question which must be answered in the autumn elections. And there are several things for Republicans to remember. Among them is this that the party strength is never better known except under pressure. In dull political times the party is usually defeated. As it comprises the mass of the intelligent voters, there is of course more independence of action than in the Democratic party. Another important fact is, that the reputation of the last New York Legislature, which had a Republican majority, was so bad as vitally to injure the party. Those who vote with the party that seems to them upon the whole the most honest and public-spirited, look at the conduct of a Legislature for which the Republicans are responsible, and decide that it is a choice between pot and kettle; and they either refrain from voting, which is a Republican loss, or they vote for a change, which may be a Republican defeat.

Besides these facts there are the heavy taxation, the uneasy suspicion of immense frauds in the revenue department, the widely-ramified personal disappointments that always accompany a new administration, and the inevitable reaction that follows the beginning of an administration of which the most impossible reforms and an ideal policy were vaguely expected.

For all these the Republican party, being in power, is held responsible, and its position is therefore precarious, and requires the utmost skill and care of every one who would deplore the renewed ascendency of the party which has been the chief source of all the national woes that the country knows, and the demoralization which is plain to every observer. If the character and purpose of the President and the Cabinet could be diffused through every branch of the administration the simple question for decision would be, whether the Democratic party gave promise of such superior honesty and capacity as to make it more to be desirable. That is a question which we shall not consider.

LOOKING AT SOME.

IT it is desirable to have neutrality laws, as the United States has recommended, it is also desirable that they should be executed. And if laws are bad, as the President sagaciously hints in his inaugural address, there is no surer means of procuring their repeal than to execute them stringently.

We have been lately engaged in this country in a somewhat sharp debate with England, in which we charge the loose execution of the British neutrality laws as a very serious offense against us; as showing, in fact, an unfriendly disposition, a willingness to see our Government overthrown. Is it not desirable, therefore, as good policy and for consistency, to say no more, but rather to exact shall allow our complaint to be at least sincere? If an expedition fitted out in England against the United States, in defiance of neutrality laws, is, as Mr. SUMNER asserts, virtually an act of war against a country with which England is at peace, is such an expedition any less an act of war if it is not British, but American; not fitted out in London, but in New York; and not against the United States, but against Spain? Yet we read in the Widow, which is very emphatic upon the British offense, that the execution of the neutrality laws of the United States merely gives "great delight to that small but malignant party" which is opposed to the liberties of Cuba. And again, in the same number of the paper, that "the Cuban cause loses naught in sympathy and support by each check it has met with, because it proper to put upon its agents here in recognition of international law."

Now if our neutrality laws interfere with the just claims and hopes of liberty now, let us have them repealed. But if they are essential to the general welfare of nations, let us have them enforced. In any case, while we are upholding the English statement that "malignant" because they would not enforce the laws, let us refrain from branding those of the United States with the name of what because they do enforce them. Meanwhile there is no prouder page in our history than that which records the sincere neutrality of the United States, however the sympathies and feelings of the people with either side; and when Mr. FISH assures the Cuban revolutionary delegate that whatever may be his own feelings or those of the Cuban movement, the national good faith requires that the United States do not make war upon Spain to liberate Cuba, he reasserts the policy of WASHINGTON.

In 1793, when the great war was raging between England, our then late enemy, and France, our ally and friend, the British Government feared that hostile expeditions would be fitted out from the United States; and, although no enlistment act had then been passed, President WASHINGTON issued a proclamation forbidding all violations of neutrality, and stating that instructions had been given to the officers of the law to arrest and bring to trial all offenders. The Governors of States were asked to arrest suspicious vessels, which they did, and prizes which had been taken from British owners were restored to them, the Government of the United States holding itself responsible for indemnification. In the next year, 1794, Congress passed a law to secure entire neutrality; and immediately after the application of the British Government upon the subject, Mr. CANNING stated in Parliament that that which creditably contrasts with Lord PALMERSTON'S declaration in Parliament, in 1863, that England could not alter her municipal laws to suit other governments. So, at a later day, during the Russian war of 1854–55, the seizure of the bark Maury in New York, at the instance of the British Consul, and upon the foreblest and, as it proved, wholly erroneous suspicion, maintained the traditional good faith which the United States in the observance of international obligation.

Is there any good reason why we should depart from this excellent course? Because we are no longer the weak nation of WASHINGTON'S day that we should less regard for the enforcement of a municipal law of our own, enacted in furtherance of international comity? "The rule, therefore," says CAIRNES, "which prohibits the using of neutral territory as a position from which to attack an enemy is simply indispensable to the existence of neutrality. Without it a war between any two states must rapidly draw into its vortex the whole world. The British Parliament elected Mr. LAIRD for boldly evading the British neutrality laws, the indignation of this country was inexpressible. But is it not precisely the same thing, so far as those laws are concerned, to insist that their enforcement merely gratifies malignant persons?

NATIONAL FINANCES.

Editor Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—Some discussion has grown up in the public press upon the question of the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to fund the greenbacks into bonds, and the following letter, which I addressed to Mr. SHERMAN, on the 7th of June, 1865, will show that I was then of opinion that he had the power, and that it was his duty to exercise it. I am still of the same opinion, and I think that the Secretary has the power to fund the greenbacks into bonds, and that he ought to exercise it. I am also of opinion that he has the power to fund the greenbacks into bonds, and that he ought to exercise it. I am also of opinion that he has the power to fund the greenbacks into bonds, and that he ought to exercise it.

Make there notes convertible in the manner essential to the proper working of the system, or by the act authorizing their issue, and our currency would be equal in value to Government bonds; and those bonds would themselves be worth more abroad, from the removal of the only failure of our Government to meet its obligations. Instead of the discount on the Five-Twenties in the foreign bond markets in gold is the measure of the premium which they would command on our demand notes.

A like opinion was expressed by me in my testimony before the Committees of Finance in both Houses sought last August and since to apply the very obvious remedy of assenting to the convertibility of the greenbacks into some class of time bonds, with privilege of reconversion at the option of the holder, consistent with the National banks, who appeared to understand the subject better than they, induced them to leave the currency to take care of itself.

The example of Austrian paper florins retired at 40 per cent. below par, rubles at 33, and French assignats repudiated entirely, should warn us against this leaving an ever-due matter of choice to grow after. Interests combine to depreciate them for profit. Newspapers and the public mind are very apt to be retained in the country," which means that they would make the currency still poorer.

Will it not be the National banks to have the "legal tenders" so poor as never to be demanded in exchange for bonds, and thus, at the same time the bonds which they have pledged at the Treasury are so much depreciated as to make it profitable to retire their notes when gold is highest?

Will the American public endure the loses incident to the depreciation of currency and private obligations without injury to the prospects of bond-holders?

We give our correspondent a hearing, as he touches upon subjects of great importance, which must soon command attention.

The acts of Congress of February 25, 1862, and of June 30, 1864, out of which authorized the issue of $150,000,000 of legal tenders, provided for the funding of these notes, at the pleasure of the holder, in six per cent. bonds. They were declared to be exchangeable for United States six per cent. bonds, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years.

The act authorizing the creation of National banks was passed subsequently, on the 25th of February, 1863; immediately after which, on the 3d of March, 1863, another act was passed, which provided that the holders of notes thus issued "shall present the same for the purpose of exchanging for bonds, as therein provided, on or after the 1st day of July, 1863, and not thereafter the right so to exchange the same shall cease."

As but six days intervened between the act authorizing the creation of the National banks and the repeal of the law for the exchange of legal tenders for bonds, and as about four hundred millions were for their conversion before the repeal took effect, it is scarcely proper to say that it was done by National banks, or that the prospective change amounted to repudiation.

During the passage of the banking act it was foreseen that a continuing power to fund the legal tenders would render the profitable or safe existence of the National banks, as the latter were to redeem their obligations in those legal tenders, for interest purposes of mischief, might be subserved to an extent inconsistent with safety. The time allowed for foreclosing this privilege, four months in the midst of war—an age, counted by the rapid passing of great events—must be deemed reasonable, especially when we reflect that the life of the Union was staked upon the legislative power to hang upon the success of the banking project. The State banks, whose position was deemed secure, would not have left it and adopted the National plan, if this power to overwhelm them had remained. Some of the State institutions here aspired to become the fiscal agents of the Government on the basis of an unredeemed issue of their local paper; and the real issue was between the adoption of such a plan and the one proposed by Secretary CHASE and made free of that objectionable feature.

We must transfer ourselves back to that dark period, with its painful doubts and imperative necessities, to arrive at the rule by which these measures should be judged.

We have arrived, however, happily to the enjoyment of peace, and, looking back upon the grave mistakes made during the conflict and since—chief among which were the extravagant issues of paper made with a view to float the debt, and the failure of President JOHNSON, on the happening of peace, to call an extra session of Congress to provide instantly a financial policy suitable to the new situation—we are to consider what remedies are required.

And here we agree with the tone of our correspondent, that the National banks, with few exceptions, are opposed to what has now become essential, an improvement of the currency. The debtor interest, which these corporations in the main represent, with all its speculating tendencies, is against contraction and against weeding out and thinning off these institutions. It would not be expedient to re-enact the original plan for funding, as it would apply to $300,000,000 of the $355,936,431 50 of legal tender notes in circulation on the first of the present month, of which the great bulk have been reissued without the convertible clause. The process of improvement must be gradual, as we to permit preparation and prevent a shock. Various modes are presented, most of which would accomplish the purpose.

The three per cent. certificates amounted, on the 1st of June, 1869, to $53,075,000, on which interest had accrued to $1,061,500. This paid off, or purchased to go into the sinking fund, would amount to a contraction, as it substitutes part of the reserve which the National banks may hold instead of legal tenders. The issue of compound interest notes, at 4½ to 6 per cent. interest, would in amount to as much as might be absorbed without too much rapidity, would surely accomplish the work of contraction sufficiently if carried out with firmness, a corresponding amount of legal tenders to be simultaneously destroyed, and the new interest notes to have the function imparted or rather transferred to them of being a tender. This transfer would not be a new execution of the power, but would be merely a continuation of what was already done, and the legality of which is protected by the vital necessities of an unparalleled conflict.

Other schemes for returning from a debased to a sound currency have been proposed, but their discussion will be of little avail at present. It may be that a majority of the people, debauched by the use of depreciated paper currency, will by disaster to themselves in their financial affairs, to be stimulated to a return to the recognized metallic basis for such issues. If they do the present will be one of fruitful of trouble, and it may not be until they adopt the plan of a currency redeemable in the precious metals that our country will be restored with the power to compete with foreign people, and be on the road to the commercial supremacy which the future will unfold, if in this vital matter we are true to ourselves.

NATIONAL DISCRETION AND RESPONSIBILITY.

In the discussion of the Alabama question it should not be forgotten by our friends in England that the American objects to the principle that every nation must reserve to itself the discretion of conceding belligerent rights to actual belligerents. This is a principle of international law which is in the nature of revolutions or freedom. If a strong and well-sustained popular movement against a despotic government in any country, every free government will, of course, exercise its discretion, and will both concede belligerent rights to the revolution and recognize its practical independence, at once, and, of course, at the risk of consequences. This was distinctly stated by Mr. WEBSTER in the HULSEMANN letter. No statesman in this country understands the subject will object to this principle.

It is, therefore, not the exercise of this right, but the time and circumstances under which it is exercised, that determine the loyalty or hostile disposition of another power. If, for instance, when the revolution in Cuba began last October, before any serious blow had been fought, before, indeed, there was more than the evident intention of war, the United States had issued a proclamation of neutrality, might not Spain justly be complained of that it was unfriendly as giving the revolution respectability, and would not all other powers have been sure that it was intended to help the revolution and secure the separation of Cuba for our own purposes? And if Spain emerged triumphant and powerful from the contest and in a condition of ability to cope with another nation, should we not, of course, expect a very grave demand for explanation?

This is the substance of our feeling of unfriendliness in the British concession of belligerence. It was both hasty and unnecessary. The war in Cuba has now lasted nearly ten months, but the United States have not found it necessary, even with all the sympathy which is not concealed for any such movement toward independence, to recognize the belligerent rights of the revolutionists. Why, then, did the British Government before a single great battle had been fought, when there was nothing but the apparent intention of a war, and before the arrival of the American Minister, hasten to invest rebels against a friendly government with all the rights of belligerence? Why should the proclamation have issued at all? Mr. Forster says that, if it had not been issued, privateers would have sailed from English ports under letters of marque. Very well; they would have sailed under a flag not acknowledged, and would have been mere pirates. Moreover, in 1856, Great Britain, as a member of the Congress of Paris, proposed to do away with privateering. Before the proclamation issued we had professed our willingness to accede to that document, and the offer failed because Great Britain wished to except the actual operation from its operation. The people of this country do not deny the right of England to determine when belligerent rights shall be conceded; but they feel that the circumstances under which the right was exercised in our case showed a disposition which raises a presumption against a vigilant observance of neutrality.

Mr. Seward, who has been blamed for his instructions to Mr. Adams upon the relation of slavery to the war, was at least very explicit upon this point at the earliest moment. His apprehension was that England would recognize the Confederacy; and in one of his earliest dispatches to Mr. Adams, No. 10, dated on 31st of May, 1861, before the news of the proclamation had reached this country, Mr. Seward wrote:

"British recognition would be British intervention to create within our territory a hostile state by overthrowing this republic itself."

And again:

"A concession of belligerent rights is liable to be construed as a recognition of them [ambassadors, agents, &c.]. Any of these precedents will pass unquestioned by the United States in this case."

Indeed, it is very plain from the letters of Mr. Adams that the general opinion of the country when he arrived was that the rebellion would probably succeed. That the proclamation was issued to help it is certainly not evident. But that it was hurried with a conviction, on the part of the Government of the probable success of the rebellion can hardly be denied. Add to this the fact that the escape of the Alabama, facts so notorious, so indisputable, so shameful that Earl Russell himself declared that the escape was "a scandal and a reproach;" and we do not see why the British Government should not frankly say to Mr. Motley: "We waive the exact legal points, and we accept the responsibility. We admit the escape of Alabama through the negligence of our agents." Such a hearty overture could not be misunderstood. Nobody believes that Englishmen are cowardly; and every act would prove them to be magnanimous, while it would do more to cement the intelligent friendship of the two countries than twenty volumes of diplomatic correspondence and legal hair-splitting before arbitrators. We hope, at least, that Englishmen will understand that there is an intelligent and honorable public opinion in this country which can readily distinguish between a general desire of real amity and cowardice—an opinion which instantly understands and heartily despises those in either country who perplex an honorable settlement by the tone and conduct of bullies.

THE STATE OF TRADE.

The Secretary of the Treasury has again been aided in his desire to put down the price of gold by the action of the German bankers in selling exchange founded on fresh sales of our bonds in Europe. The speculation for a rise in gold has once more been checked by this influence.

There is, however, a want of spirit on the side as well of those who operate for a fall as of those who operate for a rise in the gold market, which is unquestionably founded on the singularly unnatural situation. Still between one and two per cent. under this influence, although up to this time our exports continue to rise and show our impetus.

The problem which confuses Wall Street and indeed all business men is this, at what precise time the balance against us on the trade between us and the foreigner will be more powerful than the effects produced by the sale of our bonds in foreign markets. No one can fail to see that a turn must take place attended with more or less of severity in individual cases according to the amount of imprudence which has been indulged in. While this state of things has a depressing influence upon trade, there are other causes now at work which aid in stimulating it.

The recent advance in cotton will give to the Southern States a considerable addition to their pecuniary means, which now will be distributed among the planters, the reverse of what took place last year, when the advantage of a rise was divided between the foreign manufacturers and the cotton brokers. The policy which has governed in the sale of this year's crop has been extremely sagacious on the part of those most deserving of advantage—its lately unfortunate producers. It was founded on a careful estimate of the wants of manufacturers and their diminished means of satisfying them.

But the most important element in imparting strength to the United States is the starting of new streams of emigration to our shores. The skilled laborer of England is settling the question of an insufficient supply of food by coming hither to eat of our abundance. The sophistry of those English writers who, in the face of a continued slaughter of untold cattle, maintained that the domestic supply of food was equal to what was usual, has been penetrated by those who find that their wages have been diminished, and the load flowing, as they eagerly suppose, with milk and honey rises with hope to their view. It is this which informs the capitalists of Europe of our great future. The people are willing to pay twice as much for a price of cotton, who have food to spare to satisfy the demand from any quarter, and who can thrash without knowing if the population that crowded states can not feed, and consequently eject, must be regarded as the coming power. That credit should be given carelessly in the face of an undoubted balance of trade against us might for a time be expected.

The advance in cotton has been attended with an advance in gold, which has unquestioned article, both as the mills and in the hands of city jobbers, but not so as to produce an equalizing price. The mills which stopped, and those which are on short time, cannot, it is as they suppose that no profit can be made by the resumption of ordinary work. The increased price of breadstuffs has led to the action of jobbers more than to the operations of country distributors. It is part of the preparation for the fall trade soon about to open, as his purchases apparently reasonable basis of a greater advance in raw cotton than of the manufactured article. The policy may encounter difficulty from the want of confidence of money among the Western people, and a consequent unusual economy, augmented by the expectation that raw cotton will fall as the dimensions of the new crop come to be understood.

HENRY J. RAYMOND.

In the midst of the general regret at the death of Mr. Raymond, the tone of tenderness expressed in all that has been said of him is remarkable, and well interprets the man and the impression he made. From his early youth, and his professional demands, he was engaged in every kind of public debate and controversy. Yet although before he died a certain weariness and disappointment were unquestionably to be observed in intercourse with him, there was often apparent a youthful freshness of feeling which endeared him to all who knew him well, and a boyish charm of surprise in a man whose experience was supposed to be of a kind that strips life of its illusions, if not of its ideal.

Mr. Raymond was called a man of generous impulses rather than of strong convictions; but it would, perhaps, be more accurate to say that he was of that temperament which sees the reason of both sides, and is plainly of vehement assertion seemed false and warm partisanship folly. The Mail says of him that he told a friend he never finished a sentence without a profound feeling that it was false and foolish. It is a quality of many of the finest natures. Louis Blanc remarks in that Gladstone. But to prudence and diplomacy which is incompatible with leadership, both by preventing entire self-confidence and by begetting distrust in others. Consequently it was said of Mr. Raymond that he was a trimmer, as it was said of Mr. Gladstone that he was a prig.

But he smiled at the charge, and declared that every truly wise man was necessarily a trimmer, as it was called, in politics. Party politics, he insisted, were not morals. They involved morals only as they were methods of reaching results; and the highest duty of the statesman, he thought, is to discover in what way, under the circumstances of the particular situation and hour, the greatest good is known to be, the good result is to be worked out. This feeling explains Mr. Raymond's fidelity to Mr. Seward. It believed that Mr. Seward's objects were humane and wise, and was founded in his practical political sagacity, and Mr. Seward spoke for Mr. Raymond, as well as for himself and those who are accustomed to politics, when he said: "I early learned from Jefferson that in politics we must do what we can, not what we would." It is a specious but perilous maxim, for it beguiles a man not only to lower the standard of action but of thought, and serves the purpose of the rascal equally with that of the statesman. It is "the cant of fate for human nature," is the most subtle of Mephistophelian counsels.

We met Mr. Raymond just four years ago, a day or two before the Fourth of July, 1865. The joy at the end of the rebellion and the horror of the assassination had both passed away, and Andrew Johnson was still trusted by Charles Sumner and Major Stearns. We stood talking upon Broadway, and Mr. Raymond never seemed more buoyant and hopeful. "Well," he said, "how about reconstruction?" To the reply that equal suffrage must be the corner-stone, he said, "Undoubtedly; but how shall we get at it?" And in a few words he stated the position that he afterward elaborated in his speeches in Congress and in the columns of the Times. Politics with him was a question of how to get at it; and his sense of the injustice and even absurdity of an unconditional assertion of one side, and of the folly of denouncing a mere difference in the judgment of methods as moral guilt, inclined him to a gradual, as opposed to the "thorough," policy, and prevented the spirit of courtesy which always distinguished his discussions. This last was not politeness merely; it resulted from that fine sense of propriety which concedes that, as the question is open, no opposite argument may be the soundest after all.

Unfortunately with this temperament was joined a very decided political ambition. We say unfortunately because the time in which Mr. Raymond lived demanded the most positive political faith and conduct, while the character of his mind and his temperament forbade that unquestioning confidence which is essential to leadership, and with any thing less than leadership he could not be content. His remarkably serviceable, if not genuine and brilliant, by quickness, available knowledge, facility of speech and writing; his astounding capacity of labor, his quenchless ardor and cordial manner constantly preferred him to conspicuous positions, which he filled always with credit, and never with that kind of superiority upon which his heart was set.

Mr. Raymond was one of the early Republicans, and wrote the Pittsburg address. In 1856-60 he supported first Mr. Fremont and would take a course in which moderate Republicans could support him; and his political philosophy prevented him from seeing that a man so wholly without political neutrality as Douglas must be destroyed, as he was destroyed, in an actual crisis. During the war Mr. Raymond was uncompromising in his support of the Union. "Through Baltimore or over it," we heard him say on the 20th of April, 1861, in a public speech. He wrote the Baltimore resolutions of 1864, and was made Chairman of the Republican National Committee. But the old despondency occasionally mastered him, and his sometimes gloomy view of the political horizon. Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Raymond were mutually attractive. The sweet inflexibility of the one was gratified by the cheerful good sense of the other: and Mr. Raymond's only book is the "Life of Lincoln."

Long before this time his genius as a journalist was fully developed and acknowledged. Mr. Greeley, himself an amazing worker, has recorded his admiration of Mr. Raymond's industry; and while he was still connected with Mr. Greeley on the New Yorker and Tribune, he was engaged as literary adviser to the Harpers. He was the first editor of Harper's Monthly magazine, and the original prospectus which appeared in the first Number. He made the selections for the Magazine, and prepared the "Monthly Record of Current Events," as literary adviser or "reader," his just statements were so sound that the gentleman who succeeded him when he became editor of the Times used to say that his own opinion differs from that of Mr. Raymond, I should like to reconsider it; but if any one else has read the book, and his view differs from mine, I will let my opinion stand. Raymond's opinion is worth more than mine." The last paper which he wrote for Harper's Magazine was the "Work of Apologizing," which appeared in the Number for January, 1854, the month following the fire in which the buildings of the Harpers were destroyed. His relations with the house continued for its early years, during his legislative career, and while he was Lieutenant-Governor, and until after the establishment of the Times, and the mutual friendly regard was never interrupted.

The versatility of Mr. Raymond's gifts, and his instinctive knowledge of what a newspaper should be, made the Times an eminence as a technically "well-edited" journal, which it has never lost. The strictly professional qualities of a journalist we need propose to discuss; but no man in the country has probably ever possessed them more fully than Mr. Raymond.

His personal character, did not satisfy him as we have seen, and he passed from one official position to another—from the speakership of the State Assembly and the presidency of the Senate, in which places his parliamentary knowledge and skill are traditional, to the Congress of the United States. He appeared at a time when only the most popular policy was practicable. But Mr. Raymond's intellectual temperament again warned him of all that was to be said upon the other side.

"Old things need not be therefore true,
O brother men, nor yet the new;
Ah! still a while the old thought retain,
And yet consider it again!"

It was the spirit of Falkland in the English civil wars. But, however sincere, it was perilously untimely. It could not have saved liberty in England, and in America its results would have been disastrous.

The Philadelphia movement of 1866 was naturally full of promise to Mr. Raymond as opening that moderate way in which alone he thought the country could safely move. It was, however, really an invitation to the republican party to break ranks in front of the foe and before the battle was decided. Raymond's earnestness led him to take a prominent part not for his personal advantage only, but undoubtedly to show that it was not a masked Democratic movement, as was alleged. He was, however, still Chairman of the National Republican Committee, and his action was a fatal political mistake—how fatal the New Orleans massacre only too plainly revealed. From that time Mr. Raymond seems to have been a changed, perhaps a disheartened, man. He owned his mistake with a most generous frankness. But he was really too candid and perceptive that it undoubtedly showed him the futility of his political hopes, and his incapacity for the leadership for which he desired. Thenceforth he devoted himself exclusively to the conduct of the Times; and although he became Chairman of one of the Republican organizations in the city, it was in the hope of effecting a reconciliation, and finding that it was not practicable he very recently resigned.

He died undoubtedly of overwork. His capacity of labor, as we said, was prodigious; but he had been twice warned by failing health that he was straining his powers, and twice he fled to Europe to obtain permanent recuperation. The suddenness of his death, although a grievous shock to those dearest to him, is for himself not to be deplored. He was never unkindly regarded than when he died, and in the natural reaction of the intense political excitement of the last four years his character and his services were more justly estimated. No man in the editorial fraternity will be personally remembered for more friendly acts, for a more constant kindliness of nature. He was served in manner, but the courteous tone of his paper was only the reflex of that of his social intercourse.

Undoubtedly, as his name is kindly mentioned, there is a half feeling which is always inseparable from a man of his peculiar temperament, of lost opportunities and wasted powers. But it is a feeling of fate rather than of censure. And so we are sure it seemed to those members of the old Press Club of sixteen or seventeen years since who stood by the coffin of their comrade. Remembering the gay and brilliant Saturday feasts long ago at the Astor they recall so bright a companion, so friendly and cordial, no truer master of his craft, than HENRY JARvis Raymond.

NOTES.

The twenty-fifth annual meeting of the New York State Library Association will be held at Ithaca in "Library Hall" (Cornell University) July 27, 28, and 29. The opening address will be made by Mr. Justice Miller, the Vice-President. Lectures and papers are also expected from B. Waterhouse Hawkins, the eminent artist; Mr. Marshall, Professor Charles Davies, and others.

An efficient Committee in Ithaca is engaged in providing entertainment and lodging for all who may attend the Association; and the hotels have consented to adopt special reduced rates of charge for the members in attendance, not to exceed $2 per day.

The telegraph made Mr. Goldwin Smith's stay at Toronto that "the American press was deeply interested in his intelligence." Mr. Smith of course denies in a note to the Tribune that he ever made any such remark.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

The Boston Peace Jubilee closed June 19 with the concert by the children of the public schools. The closing piece was "Old Hundred," and was sung by the audience and children together. After the concert the Mayor gave a public reception, which was likewise with a gold watch and chain.

The funeral of Henry J. Raymond took place at 5 P.M., June 21, at the Presbyterian Church, corner of Fourth Street and Washington Square, in this city.

Over 1200 Chinese arrived from Hong-Kong at San Francisco on the 15th inst.

The body of John Wilkes Booth is to be placed side by side with those of his father, Junius Brutus Booth, and sister, in Green Mount Cemetery, Baltimore.

The Allen Mania, the most eminent case of lycanthropia of Albany, died in that city June 17.

It is announced as an official statement that on an average about seventy-five persons annually fall victims to the street cars of this city, nine-tenths of whom die.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The British House of Lords passed the Irish Church bill at three o'clock, A.M., on the 19th of June, amidst great excitement, the vote standing 179 in favor of the bill, and 146 against it. The Archbishop of Dublin and fifteen Bishops voted.

Serrano took the regency oath at Madrid June 19. General Prim announced at the same time that he was President of the Ministry: Silvela, Secretary of State; and Herrera Grace, Justice. The Republicans in the Spanish Cortes have not succeeded in their attempt to secure the banishment of the Duke de Montpensier. The Cortes has passed a bill giving the acts of the Provisional Government the force of law, and confirming upon it the power to carry them into effect.

The resolutions passed by the Repeal League at Halifax, Nova Scotia, declare that every legitimate means shall be used to sever the connection of Nova Scotia with the Dominion, and bring about a union, on fair and equitable terms, with the United States. Leagues are to be formed throughout the Province for the purpose of defeating the annexation scheme.

The Great Eastern has gone to Brest, France, from which she will shortly sail on her cable-laying expedition.

FAREWELL DINNER TO HON. A. G. CURTIN, AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, PHILADELPHIA, JUNE 12, 1869.—SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 422.]

FAREWELL RECEPTION OF A. G. CURTIN, IN PHILADELPHIA.

INDEPENDENCE HALL, Philadelphia, was tendered to Hon. A. G. CURTIN, our Minister to Russia, by the municipal authorities of that city for a farewell reception of the citizens on Saturday, June 12. We give on our first page an illustration of the dinner given on the evening of that day at the Academy of Music. Over five hundred guests were present. The building was beautifully decorated with American and Russian flags. Mr. CURTIN made an appropriate speech, recounting the memorable events of his career as Governor of Pennsylvania, and alluded to his mission to Russia in the following language:

"It is somewhat anomalous that the freest and the strongest government in the New World should have maintained the most amicable relations with the most absolute monarchy and the strongest government of the Old World. America and Russia have never had an interruption of their friendly relations. It is my earnest prayer that, during my residence at the Court of the Autocrat of all the Russias, nothing will occur to break these relations."

Other speeches were made, in response to the various toasts of the evening, by prominent individuals.

THE "RED STOCKING" BASE-BALL CLUB, CINCINNATI.

We give, on page 421, portraits of the picked nine of the "Red Stocking" Base-Ball Club of Cincinnati, Ohio. On the 16th they beat the "Mutuals," of the next day the "Atlantics" of Brooklyn. The latter game was won 32 to 10. If the "Red Stockings" keep on and hold their own, they will be the champion club before the summer is ended. Hurrah for the Porkopolitans!

THE INTERNATIONAL REGATTA.

We give on our double-page opening this week an illustration representing the Harvard crew in training on the Charles River, as a preparation for the international race, to be rowed race with the Ford crew, which is to come off in August on the Thames, upon the Putney Course. Harvard gave the challenge, and Oxford accepted.

The rowers selected by Harvard are MESSRS. LORING, SIMMONS, BASS, and RICE, forming as good a crew as can be selected. LORING, who has the charge of this crew, is 25 years of age, but a remarkably mature one. RICE is a polished oarsman; he is the "finishing stroke." SIMMONS is "stroke oarsman," and is the strongest man of the crew. The ages of the four average 24 years each. The crew proposes to sail on the 10th of July, so as to spend five or six weeks in England before the contest.

MY GRANDFATHER'S WATCH.

I.

I HAD been less than three months in New York, and if I was not actually already in love I was quite ready to affirm as much, if the occasion should be given me. Moreover, with a worldly wisdom beyond my years, I had suffered my young affections to go out toward no less a personage than Miss De Silver, the banker's daughter. Fortune and my aunt's respectability had even so far favored me that I felt myself at liberty, with a little extra courage, to call on her even at her own lordly home.

The determination to call was a thing by itself, however, as an examination of my wardrobe revealed the unpleasant fact that my present supplies would hardly serve me in keeping with what might there be expected. Solomon could have beaten me entirely. So could the lilies of almost any valley.

My slender salary as yet offered me no resources, and could it for another month. I was at my wit's end, or thereabouts, when an idea struck me. The Cheroots were always fertile in ideas, and was not I, Richard, the best of all the Cheroots? And had I not inherited my grandfather's watch? Did it not, even then, tick drowsily in its swollen fob?

Now this chronometer was of the ancient style; made in a day when the precious metals seem to have been of no account whatever. It was a sort of gold mine, with a time-piece hidden away in the heart of it. Small it may be for a gold mine, but decidedly large for a watch. It was one of those watches which impart an air of antique aristocracy to old gentlemen with good clothes, and reflect back by them for the most part that the "shabby genteel" families purchase only like old furniture.

"Sell it?" No, by no means; but I thought of Miss De Silver, and of her father, and determined to employ it as a collateral. I could redeem it at any time. Some one had explained to me the meaning of "three golden balls together," and I fortified myself with that meaning to assure for the dangling arms of the old Lombard usurers.

They were conspicuously large and bright over the door to which they attracted me, but the musty old gentleman in a square velvet cap, who took my gold mine in his fat and dusty fingers, did not realize my ideal of a Lombard. From the appearance of the crowded shelves around him, however, he was clearly prepared to realize on any thing else. Such a museum of incongruous commodities I had never seen before. Surely he was a social wrecker, and these were the spoils and waifs of unmarketable human craft that had gone ashore upon the shoals of New York life. Describe them? No, for language has limits to its powers, and so has even imagination.

I was not the first customer attended to, however, for a fair young girl before me was waiting anxiously while "my uncle" balanced in his hand what seemed to be a brooch of some beauty and value. I thought that it contained a tress of dark hair; that or something else of the keepsake kind.

"Ten dollar? Not so much as dat. Five dollar ish all."

"Only five dollars? Why, it is worth forty, and I must have at least ten!"

"Must is a pig vot, my tear. I gives you but five."

The girl's face was very pale, and her thin lips closed with an expression almost of agony, as she sighed her final assent to the amount of the proposed loan. Her ticket was quickly made out, and I could but note, as she turned to go out with that and the money grasped tightly in her little hand, that for all her poverty and her sorrow she was indeed fair, very fair.

"How mosh you vant on dis vatch?"

The hand of the pawnbroker on "my uncle" did much to dispose of a certain tingling sensation, as of many blushes, with which I had passed under the golden balls. I therefore boldly replied:

"About a hundred, I reckon."

"A hundard dollar? Oh, vell, dat ish nonsense. Ve only lends so mosh as twenty-five. Dat ish de law, my poy."

"Bother the law!"

"So shay I; it bodders me ve' mosh indeed, but I dosh not ever break de law."

"How shall I work it, then? There must be some way."

"Dere ish many vays, but dish concern minds de law. I tell you—I lets you have twenty-five on de vatch and twenty-five on de chain?"

"That won't make it up."

"Den I lets you de chain for de twenty-five, an' you takes de vatch to de diamond brokers."

A few moments' consideration, during further enlightenment as to the meaning of "my uncle" the Lombard, I took my ticket and my departure, leaving the chain with him, and in that I was, to a certain extent, a wise Cherson.

I must have been five minutes about this business, for the young girl was gone when I turned, was startled to notice, standing with her face unconsciously turned toward its almost ghastly radiance, "my uncle" with the gold chain, and I could distinctly hear her mutter to herself,

"It must be ten! What shall I do?"

Yeath, if you will be it should be good impulses, is ever inclined to benevolence, and with a sudden and reckless forgetfulness of Miss De Silver, now of the banker, I turned to the girl, toward the pale unknown and said, with hardly my customary ease of manner, "Here is five more, Miss. Don't say a word."

There was a sudden start, and a painful flush in the pale cheek, but my voice and manner were to be respected to admit a suggestion of intentional offense, and I added, quickly,

"You can pay me whenever you choose—interest, too, if you want to."

"But you are a stranger."

"So I hope is old Moses What's-his-name over there."

"Ah, I saw you there! But then, you too are poor, and I can not consent to take—to owe."

"No; I'm not poor. I'm only a fool, that's all. Please take the money. I know you want it. You don't take it you will be a bigger fool than I am."

Almost a smile struggled with the keen pain in her face, but there was no more trouble seemed fairly forced from her lips—and they were pretty if they were thin. It was nothing sensational, no sickle marker, slay or bloody bone, rent due, had landlord—just an everyday and commonplace sort of an affair. It did not sound very compassionate, as I look back to it, and—well, I crushed the five-dollar bill into her little hand, and ran as the Congressmen did at Manassas, declaring that by so doing I made the all prospect of ever being repaid.

I was anxious to get to the broker's office, however, and my watch felt heavier without its chain than it ever did with both. I must say that my heart felt not a little relieved when I left the pawnbrokers' shop. Not that I was especially fond of following morning, and my next attempt at the employment of my watch was made by the early daylight, with my brain cool, and clear of everything but Miss De Silver.

The office of the diamond broker I found the kind of sign described by "my uncle" was eminently respectable, and fronted on the busiest part of Broadway. It was a very quiet-looking building, and that was any evidence of its character, nothing could have helped it better than the aristocratic air of the elegant youth who politely greeted me as I entered. No need, certainly, of any qualmish feeling at having to do with such a gentleman as Mr. ROOS, the "diamond broker."

Rather old-fashioned watch, but the cases are heavy. Seventy-five dollars? Let me see!

The office grew balanced for a moment adroitly in his jeweled fingers, and the works scanned somewhat disdainfully.

"Seventy-five? Yes, I guess it will bear that. Thirty days only? Longer if you want it. Well, all right. Nice day, isn't it?"

Entries were made in a book or two, the watch carefully deposited in a drawer, my "ticket" was made out and presented in a neat little envelope; my money was counted out to me with an exceedingly pleasant smile and bow, and my object was attained without the slightest ripple of any thing disagreeable, unless it was the hallaughing insinuation that my impecuniosity was the consequence of recent bacchinalian excesses.

That, however, I took in good part, for I now felt sure of appearing in proper style at the De Silver mansion. My thoughts ran wholly on apparel, and the probable effect to be produced thereby.

II.

I MUST say that when my new array did come home I looked remarkably well in it, and, of course, I put it at once in service. But notwithstanding my nearer approach to Solomon or the lilies, I felt more nervousness on the De Silver door-step than even under the dangling balls of the "Lombard Arms."

As I stood, a moment later, in the frescoed vestibule fumbling for a card, I could not help overhearing a sequestered conversation which seemed to be going forward at the lower end of the hall.

"Indeed, Miss De Silver, I would not have asked, only we do need it so very much."

"Pshaw, Miss Payne! That's always the story. I won't be saucy, though, really; and if you will come in to-morrow I will try and have it ready for you. Of course you will throw off something for cash payment?"

"Oh, Miss De Silver!"

"Well, well—somebody's come, and mamma is working for the poor."

I heard a door close, and then—for somehow I was quite slow and clumsy about finding that card—the hall-door opened through the hall toward me but my fair acquaintance of the five-dollar loan? If I did not blush she did; and right before the astonished flunky she reached out her hand for the bit of pasteboard which I had just discovered, saying, in a quick, curt tone of voice,

"Your card, Sir, please!"

She was gone, and she got it, like a figure in a dream, and I was ushered into the drawing-room, staggering under a vague feeling that there was nothing else for me to do, or that somebody had asked me what time it was.

There was certainly nothing like flattery—hardly a flash of recognition—in the manner of my reception when the banker's heiress at last sailed into the room. I could not help wondering if Miss Payne was to call that stately creature "Matilda." Still, I made the best of my conversational powers, and was really making some headway, I think, in my unutterable dismay, the sliding-glass which concealed an inner parlor was drawn gently back in its noiseless grooves, and I was duly presented apparently out of the elegant "diamond broker" came gliding over the carpet, "to present his adieus to Miss De Silver," and, with the color did come to my face, but the excellent young man relieved me in the kindest manner. Nothing could be more cordial or friendly than his recognition.

"Ah, you know each other, then?"

It was the voice of Miss De Silver, and there was a tremor in it which called my attention to the fact that if I had blushed she had not—on the contrary, quite the reverse.

"Oh, indeed, every body knows Mr. Cherson. Glad to meet him. Opera to-night, Miss De Silver?"

"Ah, yes. I was about—"

How I thanked the tact of De Roos in thus giving me an opportunity to cut my call short and find my way into the street! I went in his company, of course; and certainly I could not misunderstand the cordial sociability with which we were both invited to call again.

Once in the street, however, De Roos laughed a silvery, musical laugh, and said you,"

"I see, my dear fellow, you understand business. Rather think you have put your foot in it, hey?"

"I should rather say I had," said I, though not exactly comprehending how. "Confound my stupid blunder!"

"I should say so; but then there's no harm done. Her paleness was as unlucky as your colors. Not a man of honor though, and you'll keep mum?"

Mum as the grave. Do you do much of that sort of business? I shouldn't have thought it just there."

My venture in this remark was a good one, for it implied infinitely more knowledge of the world than I possessed.

"Why, it's a perfect run of up-town trade," replied De Roos "and they're no worse than lots of other women whose husbands and fathers draw their purse-strings for them close. They're going for a party just now, and if the diamonds won't go far enough I guess the carriage will have to be mended."

"I don't take. Can't you do the carriages?" said I.

"Oh no; that's in the auctioneer line. I reckon they've never spouted any furniture, and maybe not the carriage. The old lady owns her jewels and furniture, and as for her own right; only it wouldn't do to let the old man know what she does, you know. Sometimes the auctioneers are awkward about their questions on stock in the house, too, and that's bad where it won't do to move it."

"I see. How do they take their interest?"

"Oh, only the legal, you know; but then there's commissions and a whole dictionary of charges. Average to fifteen per month."

"Profitable, I should say. I never knew about that. Excuse me, I'm dished there now, any way."

"Not by no manner of means! Safe for a perpetual invite as I am myself. Couldn't afford to make an enemy of you—don't you see?"

"Do you go there often?"

"Not very. This party, any how, for the old man's away, and I expect to be a tip-top affair. You'll be there, of course?"

"If I get my cards in time.

"Oh, no fear of that. Let's go to Delmonico's."

I went, and certainly I did learn a good deal that evening. Such men as De Roos are capital instructors, and he seemed fairly to have "taken" to me.

III.

MY card for the grand De Silver party came quite as promptly as the diamond broker had predicted; but before the arrival of that auspicious occasion I received a neat little note inclosing a five-dollar bill, and thanking me, in terms of most lady-like and sincere gratitude, for the opportune benevolence which had prompted my quixotic loan. The note was signed, plainly, "Clara Payne." The circumstance gave me no pain whatever, but brought vividly to my mind the conversation which I had involuntarily overheard.

The party was every way worthy of the efforts and expenditure which I was the brilliant and successful fruition.

I met De Roos there, and was certain pause in the rush and flush of the festivities something prompted me to whisper him: "Not much falling off in the diamonds of the family. On my word, they look as well as the rest."

And he replied: "We have to be up to that, my dear fellow—trick of the trade, you know, wouldn't do to be detected."

And then he whirled away; but on a closer examination, as she stately Matilda whirled away with me in the subsequent "German," the idea became strangely fixed in my mind that the imitation was altogether too good, and that the diamonds worn that night by the heiress of the De Silvers were real. It puzzled me, but it only led me to the utterance of a remark in praise of their brilliancy, which was rewarded by a sweet smile and an increasing pallor on the cheeks of my lovely companion.

I called most assiduously after that, with a vague idea that my deficiencies in my wardrobe were quite likely to be kindly overlooked, and found, to my unspeakable delight, that I was beginning to be received on a most confidential footing; in short, quite in the character of a friend of the family. I even met the banker himself once or twice, but could not plume myself on the success which attended making him. Meantime De Roos assured me that the carriage had not required "mending," and that the diamonds of the fair Matilda and her duchess-like mother stood in no immediate danger of forfeiture.

As for myself, my employers rather liked the idea of my circulating among the "upper ten," and I awaited with the next installment of my insignificant stipend with serene indifference to any thing but the fact that it would enable me to redeem my watch. If not my chain, however I wanted to be square with De Roos at the earliest possible day.

It was by accident a trifle over a month, say a day or two, when I presented myself at my friend's office, money in pocket, with intent to bargain possession of my pendulous and somewhat cherished heir-loom. Who so polite as De Roos!

"Chair, my boy. Have a cigar? Been up to the country? Ah! You seem to be in very good headway there, ha? Serious intentions, eh? All right—lots of tin one of these days."

Before I had explained the object of my visit, and even the imperturbable De Roos changed countenance somewhat as he replied, rapidly,

"Watch? Why, I'd taken your watch to—to—to—"

"Month! Melting-pot!" I almost shouted. "I don't know any thing about a month. He's my pet—every pawnbroker in the city gives a year!"

And I whipped out my envelope, and tore from it the receipt of my property and the loan thereon. In fact I myself read it for the first time, while De Roos responded,

"Ah, my dear boy. I'm not a pawnbroker. I thought you understood these things. Read it through."

I did; and, surely enough, it was by no means a pawn-ticket, nor was there on it any mention of any loan at interest. It was simply an agreement to sell to me, on the day which had just expired, a watch whose number and description I knew only too well, at a price specified, and which was nearer ninety dollars than seventy-five.

For a moment I was fairly furious, and even uttered vague threats of vengeance; but De Roos never lost his equanimity.

"Keep cool, my boy. I'm sorry, and all that sort of thing, but I want to make a point out of you. 'Tisn't likely it's melted yet; and if you really want it, I'll send down and get it back for you. Come in to-morrow at three. Now, don't get mad. Be decent, and have another Havana. Thought you knew what you was about, you know."

So I consented to smoke and be pacified, and finally went away in the full assurance that I had really ever met a better fellow than De Roos, the fashionable "diamond broker."

Faithfully to the hour, I was at his hand the next day as the clock struck three. Having now no time-piece of my own, I had learned to appreciate clocks, both public and private. A lurking feeling of uneasiness my account for the fact that I had not called on the De Silvers during the previous evening.

I was prompth on hand, as I said, at the door of the elegant office of my elegant friend, the diamond broker; but, somewhat to my astonishment, that door would by no means yield to my repeated attempts to open it. In short, it was locked.

"Gone out for a moment," I muttered. "Well, I'll wait."

I was quietly proceeding to do so, when I suddenly found myself roughly collared by somebody in a state of excitement, while a trembling voice demanded,

"You scoundrel! You are one of his set. I've seen you with him! Where is he, and where is Matilda?"

After a moment of utter bewilderment I managed to recognize in my unlooked-for assailant the parental De Silver himself—the banker—and stammered out a half-choked declaration of my utter ignorance.

"You lie, Sir! He's gone! Matilda's gone with him! He's got all the money! You come with me to the house! Come right along now!"

Any lily of any valley could have offered more resistance than I did, for I felt that I was acquiring valuable information, and I went along with the banker. He talked incessantly, and I silently because aware that the money used by Dr Ross in his extensive transactions as a "diamond broker" had been furnished from the very respectable coffers of Matilda's father. Business had been good of late, and both bonds and deposits had been quite large enough to suggest to the elegant young financier a master-stroke in his own private line. Beyond doubt a small amount of "interest" would now suffice to redeem that precious jewel of a daughter, and De Roos had taken care to secure her portion in time. After all, he had only, in reality, married the daughter of his partner in business—a somewhat quiet way.

I remembered about the diamonds at the party, and was now quite persuaded that they were real.

When we arrived at the house we found it in a certain degree of well-regulated confusion, and Madame, the mother of the vanished Matilda, in a very impressive state of weeping and distraction; but what interested me most was a pale face that I met in the hall. It was that of Clara Payne; and I heard her mutter, in a voice whose half-despairing tone I well remembered:

"Gone? And I had so counted on her promise!"

It flashed upon me that another month's rent was overdue. The money that should have been deemed my grandfather's watch was burning in my pocket; and as I thrust it into her hand I said to her:

"You have proved yourself good pay, Miss Payne; you won't run away with any body. Just take that and run up-stairs and pay it."

This time she actually did smile in my face, but she hurried away without a word.

It took some time to convince the old banker that I was not an accomplice of De Roos; and, though he had to pay too much money on the "failure" of the sudden son-in-law ever to pardon him, he seemed to pardon me very readily when he found that I had not done any thing. In fact, the shape his pardon took was some work something to me. As for Clara Payne, I have seen her several times. In fact, I see her every time I go home.

SEEING BY LIGHTNING.

IN the Polytechnic of London some curious and interesting experiments are being made with a monster "induction coil," which produces, during in a remarkable manner. In the darkened theatre of the Institution the long flash lights up the room and the audience with the peculiar lurid glare so well known as an effect of brilliant lightning at night, and displays the features and action of every one present. But we have to note that, the flash being of instantaneous duration only, it allows no motion to be seen. We should think it guided by our unconsciousness alone, that the flash lasted an appreciable time; but this would be an error, due to the persistence of the impression on the eye after the object itself had ceased. If the room be made perfectly dark, and if the spectators all raise their arms and wave their hands to and fro as rapidly as they can the flash will display the position of the arms, but not the movements of the hands. While the flash lasts the hands do not move, and is consequently seen, as of motionless. In the position in which the flash finds it. But in contemplation to exhibit the same effect in a more complete way by affixing a picture to a revolving disk. When the disk revolves so rapidly that no outlines of the picture can be distinguished by means of any ordinary light, they will be perfectly seen in a darkened room by the aid of the flash. It lasts so short a time that the revolving disk does not change its position in the brief period.

OUR ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

Putnam's Magazine for July contains an elaborate article showing the influence of the Roman Catholic Church in this city and State. The facts presented in this article are so startling that we reprint a well-digested resumé of it recently published in the New York Evening Post:

Putnam's Magazine for July contains an article entitled "Our Established Church," which will be, we suspect, very much read. Its aim is to show that the Roman Catholics have to a considerable extent succeeded in making them the established church of this city and State.

The writer estimates that the real estate owned by fee by "one or other of five ecclesiastics in this State," Roman Catholic bishops, is worth over twenty millions of dollars. He remarks that the Irish (Protestant) Church was to be disestablished over an annual five millions of property; and he proceeds to give some examples of the private and public property and real estate made to the Roman Catholics in this State.

STATE MONEY TO ROMAN CATHOLIC CHARITIES.

Not far from the year 1847 the diligent explorer of our annual statutes will find, almost for the first time, a few donations for charitable purposes quietly stowed away in the depths of the "Act making appropriations for the support of the government" for the current year. Here and there will be found certain special statutes for like purposes—as, for example, the Act of 1848 (chapter 170), appropriating $500 of money raised by general tax to the Hospital of the Sisters of Charity in Buffalo. From the year named, when the honorable rivalry of parties was producing a like result to that which attends the not dissimilar emulation of a public auction. The bids rose one above another with a boldness which possibly was not diminished by the fact that the bidders were offering what did not belong to them. From year to year, more and larger beneficiaries of this class were found necessary to "the support of the government," until in 1866 they had multiplied sufficiently to be collected into a distinct "General Act," which has been annually passed ever since, as solicitously as if, like the English Mutiny Act, all our liberties depended on it.

At the same time, and by a movement almost precisely parallel, the yearly statute-book has been encumbered annually to a greater degree with the enactments which authorize the one for the city of New York, the other for the precisely contermineous county, the levy of such sums as the State deems adequate for municipal governance, and which prescribe the general objects for which they may be expended. Exactly in like manner, there begin to be discovered in these "Tax Levy" bills considerable sums for twenty years ago, the same germs which have fructified so bountifully in the present "Charity Bill" for the State at large. By virtue of the enactment last mentioned the State paid out during the year 1868 for institutions under religious control, $129,023 46. Of this a certain section (chapter 170 of the laws of 1868) gives of the Protestant sects but $2367 62; while the trifling balance of $124,174 84 is assigned to the various purposes of the Roman Catholics.

Looking, for the sake of variety, at the following year for data regarding the strictly municipal gifts for like purposes, we find from the report of the Comptroller of the city, that during 1867 there was paid to Catholic ecclesiastical institutions the sum of some $90,000, aside from what may lie hidden in a vast total of more than a million, of which the city pays the annual rent in the report of the Department of Public Charities and Correction. While the sums of other institutions in the list, hardly any are for objects having even remotely a religious character, and all are for a secular education. And if the proportion thus indicated hold good for the State, the Catholic appropriation, of which exceeds, we can hardly say by how much, the princely sum of half a million, will be found to exceed that the Church is in a fair way of obtaining its own, with perhaps a trifle of which to endow a Papal Nuncio to claim to.

But these figures do not fully indicate the favor with which the Catholic Church has been treated by her children in official station, co-operated with as they have been by the well-disposed outside the pale.

The last Comptroller's report contains, with regard to certain real estate in the city of New York over the head of Manhattan, some interesting avowals, by which the city government has come to the light a shine before men that they may see its works, and glorify its father, which is—Catholic. Such is the schedule of city property, subject to the payment of ground rent (pp. 464-465), which is described as one "Fifty-first Street and Lexington Avenue" are leased to the Archbishop of New York (Roman Catholic); that the lease is dated April 1, 1857, is perpetual, and for the annual rent of one dollar; that the value of the ground is arrears. That the property on "Eighty-first and Eighty-second streets and Madison Avenue" are leased to the "Sisters of Mercy;" that the lease (the date of which is not given) is perpetual, and the annual rent is one dollar, which, however, had been paid until within a few days of the report. That on the block of the first and Fifty-second streets, Fourth and Fifth avenues," was leased April 1, 1857, to "the Archbishop Bishop Acheson, "perpetually, for the annual rent of one dollar," which rent was paid up to the date of observe, has been fully paid to the end of 1867.

Upon some part of this block, and upon another tract, held by a title title and upon similar terms, is in course of erection a large and costly edifice, which is intended to be worthy of its proud rank of metropolitan church of the new archdiocese.

From estimates of those competent to appraise land in New York, it appears that this property alone is worth not less than $3,000,000. It may be considered, therefore, that the city owns a large part of this property, if it applied every payment upon the principal, including the building fund, to the purchase of years.

It is no extraordinary a ratio has this devout allotment of the public revenues increased that what in 1849 was about $15,000, or less than one-seventieth, is grown to not for from $800,000 in 1868, bestowed with the blank generosity of the present day of grace.

Thus having begun with the demand that public schools be under sectarian control, and having obtained that sectarian schools be supported by the State, the only remaining one of the principles of sectarianism in education is now vehemently urged, that all secular education be withheld from the common schools of atheism. Then, and then only, in the view of the Catholic World for May, July, will public education be put upon its true ground—the ground upon which so much has been said and so little understood in Italy and Spain, and from which that service has lately been abridged with violence in Austria and in Ireland.

Nor is the step a long or a difficult one which separates the actual condition of things from that so belonged for as an ultimate settlement. Even while we write, the bill which shall do away with "sectarian" has been maturely considered by the Committee of the Senate on "Charitable and Religious Societies." In some reported favorably to that body. Its first section, which contains its essential feature, is in these terms: that "whenever there shall be or has been established and maintained in any city of this State, by any school or schools in which not less than two hundred children have been or shall be taught, gratuitously, it shall be the duty of such city or of the Board of Supervisors of such county, if the same exist as a whole or a part, to make provision from year to year for the expenses of such school or schools."

It is not as deep as a well, nor as wide as a door-mat is to enter. Only let Catholic Ireland be taught to ask for its vain in Ireland, what it has had wrested from it in America—and it will have. Let Catholic Italy be taught to believe that the discrimination which prevails in the United States between secular and sectarian education constitutes a majority of Catholics, small as was that majority in the Senate, and it will be provided in the present Senate that a majority should be made up of Catholics. Let Catholic Italy and Protestant name who are ready to maintain the great system of Catholic education in the United States, on condition that their own little scheme of sectarian education may be carried out in Italy, and they will find their master's table; that such discrimination will see that the interests of Catholics have not been, and whatever may be the difficulty and expense of passing the bill, it will be passed in Italy.

THE OFFICES AND ROMAN CATHOLICS.

It might perhaps be worth while, if any one should prefer more minute information than we have given, to notice a few such as may be found in the city of New York itself. Not many a state church in the present age imposes the test of membership as a condition of holding civil office. The Church in Austria does not; in England it has not for forty years; in France not for eighty. It does not yet in New York. How near it comes to it may be partly guessed by any one who will look into the list of "Heads of Departments" officers with the discriminating sense of him "who can see stranger things than either Cape Cod or O'Flaherty." If the inference from nationality should be deemed liable to misconception in the instance of police, let it be remembered that the Catholics who are not Irish will far more than make such an error good. Such researches would show a judiciary adorned with the names as Shandley, Cowell, Hogan, and Donnie Quinn, and would lead us into very green fields of nomenclature: but some one else has prepared, from better data than mere names, the following summary of Irish office-holders as they were at the end of 1867:

Sheriff,
Justice,
Comptroller,
City Chamberlain,
Corporation Counsel,
Police Commissioner,
President of the Croton Board,
Clerk of the Board of Aldermen, of the Board of Aldermen,
President of the Board of Councilmen,
Clerk of the Common Council,
Clerk of the Board of Supervisors,
President of the Board of Supervisors,
Five Justices of the Courts of Record,
All the civil justices,
All the police justices,
All the police court clerks,
Seven out of four coroners,
Two members of Congress,
Seven out of ten State senators,
Eighteen out of twenty-one members of Assembly,
Fourteen-sixteenths of the Common Council, and Eight-tenths of the Supervisors.

I am thoroughly convinced, we say it with some confidence, has the circry of a Catholic establishment in it which more nearly closed upon the whole system of public education than here in New York. Nowhere in Europe is the hierarchy of an established Church pointed by the Papal See to such independence of the civil government as here.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

HARTFORD is a city of delightful residences; and a stranger who visits it is made at this season by boat, leaving the city at 4 P.M., arriving at Hartford next morning. Or, more fully to enjoy the suit on the charming scenery, they we say it with some confidence, has the cir

PEACE.

"The mystic cords of memory, stretching from every battle-field and patriot grave to every living heart and hearth-stone all over this broad land, will yet swell the chorus of the Union, when touched, as they surely will be, by the better angels of our nature."—ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

SERENE in her youthful beauty
To-day Columbia stands,
She has beckoned Peace to attend her,
The sword has dropped from her hands.
She sees her flag unsullied
Waves proudly o'er freeman's dome;
All her weary toil is ended,
She is calling her children home.

For the mystic cord of the Union
Man strove to rend in twain,
Long silent to all entreaty,
Responds to the touch again!
Responds, as if God's own Spirit
Swept over the outstretched cord,
And thrills the heart of the nation
As 'twere the voice of the Lord.

Hands that were clasped in battle
In friendship now are pressed;
Lips that once breathed out slaughter
Their error have confessed;
Eyes that flashed hate and vengeance
Their angry lustre cease,
Feet shod swift for destruction
Now tread the paths of peace.
The ears of the deaf are opened,
Unsealed the voice of the dumb,
As millions arise together,
And answer, "WE COME! WE COME!"

Oh! day of joy and gladness,
When thus the States agree,
From shore to shore uprising,
To keep the Jubilee!
Our fields with grain are ripening,
Our barns with plenty stored;
The wealth of a hundred nations
Pour in the tide of our bids is poured!
Rivers glint in the sunlight,
Insects chirp and hum,
Trees bend with their lesty verdure,
And the Summer of Peace is come!

The laborer seeks his cabin,
From his daily toil to rest;
And the rich man has no power
The poor man to molest.
On the soil to Freedom given
No slave can bondage lag;
And the Old World's despots tremble
At sight of our Starry Flag!

The Northern Lights are blending
With the stars of the Southern Cross,
And the gulf is bridged between them
By a common sense of loss.
Over the ocean wafted,
Where our loved ones were lain,
Who walked through the fatal valley,
Brothers and brothers slain,
Bloom the flowers, God's angels,
Speaking of better things—
Of endowing strength from sorrow;
Forgiveness, from death that springs.

Never was wrong so hidden—
Never the dead so dear!
Many a mound is watered
By the stranger's loving tear.
And the roses smell as sweetly
That strangers' hands have grown;
And the harvest never faileth
Where Love the seed hath sown.

Cling-cling! the bells are singing;
Boom! 'tis the cannon's notes;
The songs of peace are ringing
From a hundred thousand throats!
Glory to God! in the highest!
Amen! let the people say;
Oh, the very stones would rebuke us
If we should be mute to-day!
Glory to God in the highest,
Who hath formed the earth and sky;
Who wields over the nations,
And maketh his throne on high!
Who keepeth watch over from falling,
And sideth our weak endeavor
Who saveth our life from destruction,
For his mercy endures forever!

To Him, oh ye ransomed people,
Be praise and honor given,
For the blessings He hath sent us,
And the bonds His hand hath riven!
For He looked upon our affliction,
And hath taken away the sword;
He hath ended our days of mourning,
And peace to our Land restored!

BOSTON, June 15, 1869. SUSAN J. ADAMS.

POPE PIUS IX.

IT is not generally known, I believe, that Pope Pius the Ninth was in his youth prevented from entering the guard of honor of the Viceroy of Italy in consequence of his being subject to attacks of epilepsy. He came from Sinigaglia to Rome, and entered the priesthood in 1814, having then in his twenty-seventh year. The infirmity to which he was subject was as great a bar to his advancement in this profession as in the military, and it is said that his admission was granted by Pius the Seventh only on the condition that, when he celebrated the mass, he should be assisted by another priest. He officiated for the first time in the church attached to the orphanage in which he had for some time instructed the children, on Whit-Sunday in the year 1815. The attacks of epilepsy to which he had been subject became less and less frequent; and four years after entering the priesthood he was appointed by the Pope attaché to an ecclesiastical and political mission sent to South America. On his return from this mission to Rome he was appointed Archbishop of Spoleto, by Pope Leo the Twelfth, and was consecrated in 1827. It is considered doubtful whether his real age is seventy-seven or seventy-nine, the register in which the date of his birth was entered having been destroyed during the revolution. The Pope has been years preceding the last three or four it was repeated almost daily in letters from Rome that he was suffering from gout or some other which could not fail to kill him, it was affirmed by those who had good opportunities of judging of the matter that, both physically and mentally, he was as sound as a man could wish to be. He has not attained what are known in Rome as "Peter's years;" that is to say, he has not occupied the papal throne twenty-five years two months and a week, as the tradition runs that Saint Peter did. Nevertheless, he comes nearer that limit than any other Pope who has ever reigned; for though the popes kings have ruled during more than a quarter of a century, no Pope ever has, unless we accept the Peter tradition. The nearest to the present Pope was Pius the Ninth is Pius the Seventh, who died fifteen weeks and two days before the charmed day arrived.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY.

CHAPTER XVII.

"IT IS NOT WORTH THE KEEPING."

"WHAT was all over, then?" "Not the murmurous kiss of the waves slipping up the ridges of warm gold-en shingle; not the bright sunshine that found them with the shadow on the sea's mutable breast; nor the beauty of the woman who sat leaning against the side of a jutting rock. Her sweet languid eyes cast downward to avoid the glare of the sun, her listless hands crumpling notches of dried sea-weed, and her heart beating as calmly as whis faster than the cool pulses of the drowsy sea. That which was over was Captain Mowbray's hope of winning the woman he loved. He had taken his friend's advice, and now he had his answer—not a straightforward one, for Lady Diana had the courage to be a coward, and decided in these surgical operations of cutting away hearts she had taught to cling to her. She sought no healing for the wound she knew was particularly tender and gentle in her manner when her victim was young and handsome.

When Captain Mowbray found that "No" was to be the end of all his longing hopes and angry fears, he felt faint and sick at heart. He could not look her in the face; for a while he could not speak to answer her soft words. They seemed to him to be saying from a long way off, and "No, no," was lisped to him in countless ripples as the waves surged up near his feet. He had waited for it, but he could not find force to decide his fate. "If your answer be unfavorable, I do not know how I shall bear it," he wrote. "Unfavorable" was given in the study to have thrown at your feet. Do not trample down my life. If I lose you I believe it would drive me mad."

"They all say that," Lady Diana thought, as she looked at the letter tenderly; "but dear me! most of them get over it much sooner than they think they will."

"I must take your answer from your own lips," he concluded. "Will you meet me on the beach of the East Cliff this afternoon?"

"If I name five I shall get it over before dinner."

At four o'clock she strolled down to the seaside, and seated herself in the broken shadow of the rock, having just time to assume a graceful posture when she heard the quick, impatient steps of her lover crashing through the shingle above. Now, as he lay by her feet, his head resting on his hand, and his eyes turned away from her, with his whole energies bent on disappointment, she felt very sorrowful for him, and again wished that he had not forced her to this painful interview. But she had determined so briefly and determinately that she had not much scope for evasion. Still she did her best. She surrounded her refusal with such a sweet confusion of regret, remorse, and reciprocal passion, that any other less acute than a lover might have been beguiled by the softness of her eyes, Captain Mowbray read the word death; and as the sense of his future grew upon him, he felt sick because white, and his eyes dark with pain and anger. Death to love's thrall, love's fire, and love's hopes—that was the purport of what his head dealt out on this slumbrous afternoon. When a ribbon fluttered from the woman's hair over Thurstan's head, he caught it in a sudden rage, and kissing it passionately, wept a few hot, still tears, the sight of which filled Lady Diana with remorse and compunction. She had often seen men weep, and she always suffered pain at the sight. On this occasion, as on many others, she vowed that she would never again commit an experiment fraught with so much grief of heart to others.

"You will soon get over this," she said, gently; "you will soon forget me."

"I do not believe now that I ever can forget either you or this hour. Oh, Diana! my darling! my darling! why will you not marry me?

I would love you so, you could not help being happy with me."

She looked at him with a sort of tender envy. "I wish I could feel like that," she thought. Aloud she answered, softly, "You forget, Thurstan, that I am ten years older than yourself."

"What does that matter?" he said, simply. "You don't look it; and, besides, if a fellow loves a woman, what matters her age, if she's the only one woman that can make him happy?"

Lady Diana glanced stealthily around. There was no one in sight but the distant figure of a man who stood on a far-off headland, peering through a telescope.

"I wonder if it is a good glass," Lady Diana said to herself. Then she looked at the handsome face turned in the pain of her anguish, and she decided to risk the telescope's having a long sight.

She drooped her head on to his shoulder, and the silky burden of hair which crowned it swept his lips.

"I can never be," she murmured; "but I do love you, Thurstan: never believe that I don't love you."

His face flushed as he felt her touch; his heart's-blood was a flame that blazed and ebbed as her breath.

"Then why not—?" he began.

"Do not go into that again: it can not be. It hurts me as much as it can you to refuse you!" she cried. "I can not tell you now all the reasons that make our union impossible. You must trust me. I would marry you if I could, and that I do like you above all other men."

He looked at her face now, and saw that it was working with emotion. He seized her by her hands, and looked steadfastly into her eyes.

"Oh! I will wait, with something like a prayer, can such a face lie?"

"I do not lie!" she went on, passionately. "I swear that I love you!"

"Then marry me!"

For a few seconds the lap of the waves was all that broke the brooding silence of the noon.

Should she end it now?—all the degrading trickery by which she was ever shaming her nature? Should she let all the small meannesses of coquetry be merged in one great honest love? Should she lay by her vanity and self-indulgence, and put away all those lusts of the flesh and the devil against which her godfather's and godmother's pious lips grits of liver mugs and infantile spoons had made so poor a defense?

She heard the slow rush of the waves as it were in a dream; saw in a dream the glow of the day, and her lover's face looking yearningly in hers, as the sun shone down on their clasped hands. She felt in my room the whisper of a passing angel, who swept the pure light of his wings over her soul, as he counseled her to accept the good angel as a gift from heaven.

Then she looked up at Lord Orme's house, which was visible from where the two stood. If I put what is before me at all, it must be for that, said such as that." The generous, half-formed, half-murmured yes, which had leaped to her lips, died away. The treasured regret passed away from her eyes, and the beautiful face was once more impassible with denial.

"No, it all," Captain Mowbray said, gloomily. "You are weary of me. I have loved you too well, and shown it too plainly. You have played with me as a human toy to whom the Creator has given capability to suffer, which renders the amusement more poignant and exciting. You are tired of the game, and now I may go to the devil my own way."

"I do not know how you will go to the devil," Lady Diana replied, quietly; "men inclined to traverse that road rarely retard or accelerate their progress because of a woman's love. You will be no worse for this brief sharp pain in future."

"It shall be no better."

"And if you ever feel inclined to judge me harshly," she pursued, "remember that you are not the only one that has suffered in this hour of parting. It costs me much to give you up, and I shall sicken at the thought of the future spent without you. Good darling!" she added, softly, with a sudden outburst of candid feeling, "I shall miss you terribly for a long time—for a long time!"

He looked at her longingly; but he did not speak. It is not easy even for the most consummate and experienced coquette to make love to a man believe that, while throwing him over, she is heart and soul his own.

"It is to be good-by, then?" he said, gloomily.

"It must be so, I fear; don't make it harder to me."

In truth she felt rather injured by the undue amount of pain this scene was causing her; it was very difficult for her to feel so much, and to make her feel that he did so.

"Good-by, then," and he flung away her hands and turned to go.

She caught hold of his arm, pleadingly, and said one more quick look round her.

"Kiss me once before you go."

It was weak of him to give way to the temptation, to grant her the foreign triumph of feeling that he would be haunted by the memory of that kiss so long as he remembered her, and how she had wrenched him. She had never given him her lips before; and she did so now that his heart was sore with provocation, because the cold-hearted woman could fain administer a little honey with the sting; because she liked both him and herself so well that she wished to yield him balm for the wound, and to give herself such comfort as Anne Boleyn's executioner felt when he recalled that he had handled the queen's neck "full tenderly."

"Won't you kiss me?" she said, piteously.

He was only four-and-twenty, and so much of a philosopher as a dragoon at that age ordinarily is. He was insulted and angered by her conduct; he suspected her of flirtatiousness, and had felt inclined once or twice to-day to curse the lovely face which held him in such thrall.

But none the less did he feel the thrall; none the less was his heart drawn toward her every movement, her every trick of voice and gesture; and when he heard those faint beseeching tones, and saw the face he loved so near his own, he caught her in his arms, and kissed her in such fashion that she somewhat repented herself of her gentle advance.

"Go!" he said, at last, pushing her from him. "Go! I have got to feel very old in this hour: that pain and anger have made me look youth out of me: perhaps one day you will be sorry that you threw away my love. Meanwhile you had better keep yourself out of my sight, for after having once touched your dear mouth I should find it hard not to repeat the offense, though you should have married a worthier, and, what is better, a wealthier man."

But although he hurled this last reproach at her, he did not walk together before he left behind. Lady Diana's blandishments were rarely thrown away on the weak, vain natures of men. Captain Mowbray had acquitted her as he anticipated the rapture of that last caress.

They parted with one lingering clasp of hands at the foot of the slopes; and Lady Diana trailed her cool-hued draperies away in the direction of her house.

"Poor darling! how he felt it!" she thought, sadly.

But she smiled through her tears at a good-looking officer from the cavalry barracks, who was calling at her door as she arrived there, and begged that he would come and "cheer her solitude" to-morrow.

Then she entered her drawing-room, where a certain sheep-dog—a Miss Jones, a half companion of Lady Diana's, generally only produced on state occasions, like the family plate—was knitting away time with various devices in crochet.

"Miss Jones," Lady Diana said, impressively, "do you think you could so give others the joy do not boil the sweet-bread to rags to-night."

"Yes, Lady Diana."

"And all I am going to start for Italy in a few days, and hope for the pleasure of your company."

Lady Diana walked pensively out of the room.

"I shall find the Ormes at Spezzia," she said to herself, "and I shall sometimes row on that lovely bay with Lord Orme, whom the eternal boatman who is always the only one who rowed Milor Byron up and down the gulf, and I will see Miss Shaw about the girls at the bottom of that gulf before I permit them to join the expedition. Heigh-ho! there goes the dinner-bell."

CHAPTER XVIII.

JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE.

MEANWHILE Captain Mowbray was still left standing by the rocks; and when the gloom of night crept over sea and land, and no faint tinge of sunset was left to flush the purple-gray cliffs with evanescent glory, the young fool cast himself down near the place where she had sat, and raised the deep-edged cliff as though it had possessed the softness of woman's lips.

Among the great and little mysteries of this world of ours, which many-day by many-day clear to man's perplexed eyes, I wonder if he will learn the secret of the fascination which a flame of death is permitted to have for the harmless moths of night.

When Captain Mowbray returned to his lodgings in town Edgelo quickly perceived that his friend's manner was that of a man who has been foiled in his desire. Thurstan swore at the bullterrier because he stumbled over it, and then gave the injured-looking, wrinkled face such caresses as people sometimes lavish on dumb creatures when their hearts are aching from the unkindness of their own species—a kind of cynical, Byronical "I never had but one" (friend) and "I have no love, sir" style of feeling.

Then Thurstan could not eat his dinner, but sat and stared moodily at the wax candles on the table, and begged that Douglas would take care of himself and "not mind him." When the meal was over, and the table in the mornin room, smoking their cigars, Captain Mowbray could no longer keep the pain of his secret to himself, but burst out suddenly with—

"By G—, she's jilted me!"

Douglas looked sadly at the boy's downcast face.

"It seems hard to bear now," he said, gently; "young hearts bleed so freshly, but then they heal quickly. Time, months hence, and the memory of this will be nothing more than a dull feeling of discomfort to you."

"It is all very well to say that," Thurstan cried, petulantly; "you don't know what it is to love a woman as I did this one, or you would understand that such pain as mine can not be forgotten."

"And yet I once loved a devil in the guise of a woman so well that her loss made me a murderer and an outcast."

"Good God, Douglas! what do you mean?"

"Hear my story before you condemn me by my own words," Douglas said, quickly; "and then, if you have heard it, tell me if you don't think the love of a woman has laid a heavier burden on me than you are ever likely to be cursed with."

"When I was about five years older than you are now I was married to one of the prettiest creatures you ever saw."

"You married!" echoed Mowbray, with astonishment.

"She was as lovely as that portrait you showed me yesterday," pursued Douglas; "more lovely, because she was younger."

"She was my cousin, and I had loved her ever since she was a child and I a great gawky school-boy. I used to spend my midsummer holidays at her father's place; and in the evenings, when he and his guests were at dinner, we wandered out by ourselves through the cool shadows of the park, and conjectured of the glorious far-off future. Ana would wear royal robes, and a gold crown round her brighter hair. She would eat off beds of slaves, and I should be her chief and most favored servitor. She would live surrounded by homage and adulation. She would have no nurses, but always milk-baths for dinner. She would wear red shoes, and build a room lined with mirrors. I used to think that she seemed very lovely as she sat with her little red mouth pursed up, and her eyes looking gravely blank at the contemplation of her future glories. I, for my part, intended to travel. I wished to penetrate in the more desolate portion of the far East; where I could see the wild silvery-trees force their way through the old Asiatic temples, and hear the parrots chatter round the ruined towers. Above all, I wished to kill a tiger, and to be gifted with strength that would enable me to thrash Tom Spenser, the big bully of our school. If at fifteen I had possessed half the intuition a girl has at ten, I should have already detected the coquettish propensities of my little ally. She nearly moved without a sobbing glance to see who was observing and admiring her pretty face; and at eleven years old she could fix a knot of ribbons or a flower in her hair much more becomingly than could the old nurses who had attended her from her birth. Time passed away quickly and delightfully in those days. I was very successful at school, and used to bring piles of prize-books to Ana and write her name inside them; announcing in crooked characters that they were given "to her as keepsakes by her affectionate friend." She smiled pleasantly at the gifts; but she generally gave me to understand that a new sash or a trinket would be more acceptable; and once she cried with rage and vexation when I presented her with my last schoolfellow, a copy of the Odyssey. I was innocence; for, as she said, 'Of what use was the nasty thing to her when she couldn't read it, and who business had I to be able to read it when she could not?

"This is the pleasantest part of my story—the rest I will tell as briefly as possible. When Ana was seventeen and I eight-and-twenty we were married. I was always a grave, quiet man and perhaps she never knew how gayly my heart used to beat as the sound of her laughter floated pressed I felt if the slightest cloud of discontent passed over her dear face. We were not very rich, and my father's interest obtained me only a lucrative appointment in India I was glad to accept it. We lived in India two years, blessed to me by the perfect fullness of gratified love, and by the society of the creature I prized most in the world. One day I was summoned home to England. My father was in a hopeless state of health, and he was loth to die without once more seeing the faces of all his children. I could not resist my own wishes, but I felt very sad at heart when my beautiful wife hung round my neck, giving me her last kiss.

"She had resigned herself to not accompanying me, she said, knowing that it was best so; but I must not suppose to be, or her heart would break under the weight of her loneliness.

"As I was leaving the door she ran up and asked me for one more caress. I gave her not one but many, and then I went on my way, observing with satisfaction that she watched me from the window as long as I was in sight.

"When I had gone about an hour on my journey I was seized with a terrible longing to see her again. I yielded to the impulse for a few seconds, called myself a fool, and went on a few steps further; then I thought of Ana's face, from which I was going further and further every step in the blackness, and turning my horse's head round, I galloped back toward home, and in less than three-quarters of an hour I was again at my own door. I dismounted and walked softly toward the window of our sitting-room. 'How glad she will be,' I thought, 'how the dear face will beam at the sight of mine!'

"My heart beat but with pleasurable agitation as I pressed my face close to the window. I was on the point of calling her by her name when I saw—Oh hell! I saw her sitting with her face turned away from me, her hands clasped in those of another man, her lovely head drooping languidly on his shoulder.

"I recognized the man at once; he was an officer of artillery who had been a frequent visitor to my house, and to whom I had always believed to be the soul of honor.

"There are certain flowers of a remembered odor of which one is sicken me; for that still summer night was steeped with their fragrance. There are voices to recall which sting me with remorse; she appeared in the voice of my wife and her lover, murmuring low, through the twilight, their joy in each other's society, their delight in my presumed absence.

"I can not dwell on the wreck of that moment. I dare not remember all the storm of horrible feelings that surged up in my breast.

"I did not pause to ask myself whether she were or were not guilty to the last extremity. From what I have since heard of her, I believe she was practically innocent; but were it so, I hold her to be more mutually criminal than if she had erred through an excess of illicit passion. Her heart was full of dishonor; her mind must have been very foul, if for mere vanity's sake she could so wrong me and herself.

"At that moment, when I saw her thus, I felt that I could sooner hold the vilest wretch that walked the streets to my bosom than the woman with whom I had lived for the last two years in happiness as beautiful as paradise.

"It was well for the grace of their parting that they did not perceive the pale face glaring against the window-pane. I can see now the smile with which he said, 'Au revoir!' and her answering gesture, kissing her hand as he drew near the door and me, and her light laugh as he stooped to press his lips on her hand.

"I concealed myself in the shrubs until he had passed out of sight of the house, and then I followed him until he reached a secluded portion of the road.

> 'And for bonnie Annie Laurie,
> I'd lay me down and die,'

he sang as he went, in a rich, clear voice.

"'God, how pretty she is!' I'll light a cigar.'

"He stopped by the side of a broken bit of rock to search his pockets for a tinder-box, whistling gayly, he met me face to face.

"I had my traveling pistols with me, for some of the wilder districts through which on my journey I was bound to pass, were infested with robbers. Without speaking, I showed these to him, indicating that he was to select one. He took the pistol mechanically, and then fell back with a face white as death.

"I gave him a few seconds to recover himself, and then I broke the silence.

"'Sir,' I said, 'you have ruined, by your treachery, the happiness of my life. I am a hasty and unforgiving man, and I am not made sorry by the reflection that I am about to kill a fellow-creature. I am not sorry, but I am sad, when I remember that the sister of my wife, the daughter of my father's friend, has been dishonored as an adventuress. Above all, I wish to kill a tiger, and to be gifted with strength that would enable me to thrash Tom Spenser, the big bully of our school. CHAPTER XIX.

AZALEA'S PERPLEXITY.

"WHAT'S to be done about your learning, Azalea?"

George Moore had recovered the power of speech, and the partial use of his limbs; but his language was often confused, and his face looked more troubled than it had done in the days before his seizure.

"What about my dear?" Azalea said, anxiously; "I am sure I learn all you tell me to."

"But, do you know, Azalea?" the old man answered, impressively, solemnly. "I'm not sure I always tell you right; my memory is gone, and sometimes I wake up in the night, and am frightened to think that I may have put you wrong and then I want you to know how to do needlework, music, arithmetic, and painting, and all such sort of things."

Azalea looked perturbed.

"I know a little arithmetic," she said, "from counting the apples. I do it all on my fingers."

The old man shook his head. "That isn't the right way."

"Any way's right which you can do quickly and best," Azalea observed, with conscious self-complacency. "I can draw much better than Rosa or Amelia Orme; but then they're duffers."

"What!" Moore said, with a puzzled expression.

"Oh! that's one of Conrad's words," Azalea answered, laughing.

"I don't believe it's in the dictionary," the old man said, gravely: "I'll hope those little Ormes haven't been taught to be bad words."

"I won't say it again," Azalea answered, seriously.

And Moore felt gratified both at her obedience and the reflection that he had snubbed the unconscious rival, of whom he was sometimes jealous; Conrad being the only person Azalea ever mentioned with affection when she referred to her visit to London.

Moore looked with despair at the tattered Virgil, feeling how uncertain a tenure his wavering mind held of its contents. "I want her to hold up her head with the best of them when she grows up, so that he can't taunt her with not having been educated like his."

Speech of Lord Orme's, implying that Azalea would be degraded by the life she had elected to lead, was ever present in the old man's mind.

How to secure the requisite accomplishments without putting from his treasure was the problem over which he pondered night and day.

Azalea confided the difficulty to old Sally: "If I'm so much trouble more; it seems to vex daddy so much," she said.

"I'm sure you know as much as is good for you. I don't know how much learning a sewing and writing only lead honest folks astray," Sally remarked, sententiously. "There's my eldest boy made a good deal of boasting-schule, and was took so much count of he was made clerk in a bank, where he made use of his larning to forge in the master's name, and wrote courtin' letters to his missus; and of course his master was much put out about it, and poor Sam was sent over the water. Do learn nothing by Sam, my dear, in case you should be tempted and fall like him."

"Who teaches at the school now?" Azalea asked, disregarding the moral warning; "is there a big and strong old lady and long bonnet?"

"A stuck-up thing who don't know B from a bull's foot," Sally said, contemptuously; "only the little chaps go there whose mothers want to keep 'em out of the way. Schule is handy in keeping time if they ain't good for nothing else."

"Is there no one else who teaches?" Azalea inquired, thoughtfully; "isn't there a school where I could learn singing and dancing, and those sort of things?"

"They haven't got further than the Old Hundredth in the Sunday-schule; they try Hallelujah sometimes, but it sounds very comical."

Azalea pondered for a time against the pane, and looked dreadly at the red leaves whirring past.

"What's to be done?" she said; "daddy frets so over my book and needlework, and then when he is restless, he stammers, loses his words, and cries. I quite forget my lessons."

"Mr. Douglas teaches the Squire's son," suggested Sally. A gleam of hope lit up Azalea's face.

"Who is he?" she asked. "Where does he live?"

"Oh! he's a mighty unsociable sort of man, who has come to live at the little house in the lane at the back of the church. He never will take a comfortable cup of tea with a neighbor, and thinks that he can keep the gentlefolk as well as the farmers; but he must be a wonderful clever man, for the Squire and the parson are going to send their lads there for a little while every holiday time, just to prevent their larning from slipping out of their heads like."

"If he can't teach me, why shouldn't he teach me?" Azalea suggested.

Sally shook her head doubtfully. "I don't think he's much wropped up in gals; he won't have no one but an old woman to do for him, and they do say he's wonderful ugly temp red."

Azalea then fell upon Topaz, and bestowed many caresses on his wrinkled chin and smooth head, all of which the terrier received with an air of blinking condescension. Having soothed her mind by this proceeding, she put on her hat, and took the path that led to Church Lane, as that grassy shadowed road was called on the borders of which Robert Douglas's cottage stood.

FAILURE.

BY JEAN INGELOW.

We are much bound to them that do succeed;
But in a more pathetic sense are bound
To such as fail. They all our loss expound;
Their comfort be for work that will not speed,
And life—itself a failure. Ay, his deed,
Sweetest in story, who the dusk profound
Of Hades flooded with entrancing sound,
His much love's tears, was failure. Doth it read
Therefore the worse? Ah no! So much to dare.
He fronts the regnant Darkness on its throne.
So much for love, that love might prove.
He pours out love's disconsolate sweet moan.
His wins, his see for that his deed was done.
His power is in the look which casts him all.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

GOING TO EXTREMES.—A friend of ours is so humane that he can not even bear to drive a long hearse.

HYPOCHONDRIAC REASONING.—Why is horse-racing a necessity?—Because it is a matter of course.

"My dear," said an affectionate spouse to her husband, "you left your only trousers——" "Yes," was the cool reply, "and I would willingly lay it up to heaven."

Not long since an elderly lady entered a railroad carriage at one of the cities situated on Lake Superior, and the passengers a good deal with complaints about a draft of air from the window. That she was troubled with a gentleman present, who had himself been a victim of rheumatism in the same condition, and said: "I can tell you from my electricity, Madam? I fried it, and in two minutes I had a short line it cured me."

Immediately, exclaimed the old lady: "yes, I've tried it myself, Doctor. Indeed, I took a box of Brandreth pills a year ago, but it didn't do me a single morsel o' good."

In a class of little girls in one of the schools of Boston the question was asked, "What is a fort?" "A place to put men in," was the ready answer. "What is a fortress?" was asked the teacher. This seemed a puzzler, until one little girl of timid manners answered, "A place to put the women."

Two distinguished philosophers took shelter under one tree during a heavy shower. After some time one of them complaining that he felt the rain—"Never mind, brother," said the other, "there are plenty of trees when this is wet through we can go to another."

At the late meeting of the Presbytery, when the subject of ordination was under discussion, Dr. Hall said early in his ministry he and another brother were conducting a meeting in which there was a large religious interest. An old man gave expression to his joy so exuberantly, and continued it until he began to interrupt the services. Brother H—— said to Brother ——, "Can you not shut that man up?" The word to him and spoke a few words, and the shouting man left the house. "How did you do it?" asked Brother H——. "What did you say to the old man that quieted him so effectually?" Brother —— replied, "I asked him for a dollar for foreign missions."

A wealthy gentleman who owns a country seat near Boston, has a son who has fallen in love with the dress through his estate. He announced the narrow escape of his son from matrimony, and was congratulated by one of them—an old bachelor—wrote as follows: "I always told you that ever was too handsome."

"My friends," said a returned missionary at a late anniversary meeting, "let us avoid sectarian bitterness. The Lord is full of His blessings. I have been laboring for many years, have a proverb that, through good and evil report, I have held on my way in spirits, you can not get the crook out of it." Now that is a good story, but it is simply the crook to dog's tail, which can not be eradicated: and I hold that every man be allowed to wag his own peculiarity in peace.

"What branch of education do you have chiefly in your school?" said a visitor to Sandy. Sir; the master has used up almost a whole tree."

It was an apt answer of a young lady who, being asked where she was born, replied: "I was none; I am the daughter of a Methodist minister."

An extraordinary instance of the power of sleep on the animal economy occurred the other day in Texas, who was a great sleeper, was thought by his family to be dead. He was waked and upon itself was found that they found nothing in the bed but his night-cap. Some certain circumstances connected with his sudden by a medical gentleman gave it as his opinion that he had slept himself away.

"If we go to war, father," said a bright-eyed boy, the other day, to his clerical parent, "from what part of the Bible shall we get the text for a new sermon?"

The good minister being taken by surprise at the question, looked for a moment, and then shook his locks of the child with a sort of paternal pride, answered that he believed it would be from Lamentations.

Dan Marble tells a story about a Yankee tailor dunning a man for the amount of his bill. The man was a big fellow, and the tailor very timid, that he could not bear to see him. He said the tailor "had a good deal of cheek, but would be sorry, but if you are sorrier than I am, I'll quit."

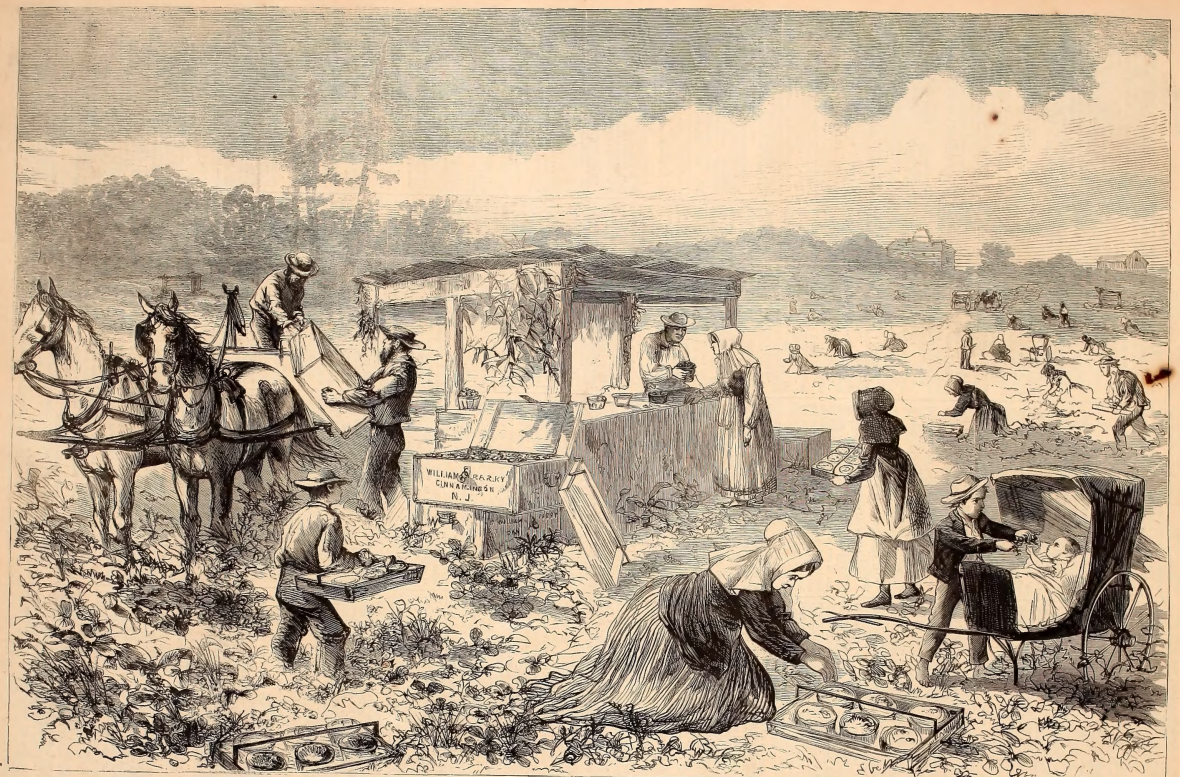
A lady, proudly conscious of her dignity, while descending on the steps of a steamboat, which belonged to a large company of visitors that the three classes of the passengers, which the boat was accommodated, might be well compared to china, delf, and crockery. A few minutes after they saw she had left her little girl to the nursery. John, the footman, was dispatched with the message that she was left in the cradle.

The following replies were given to the question, "Who has lost his mind?" "Please, sir, Ike has lost the horses."

The following morning a trass of straw was left at his house, with the message that "it was the new servant who had come to fill the vacant place."

WAY OF THE WORLD.

Determined beforehand, we gravely pretend
To ask the opinions and thoughts of a friend;
Should his differ from ours on any pretense,
We pity its weak and contemptible influence;
But if he falls into and flatters our plan,
Why, really we think him a sensible man.



STRAWBERRY CULTURE, NEW JERSEY—PICKERS IN THE FIELD.—SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 429.]

BOSTON AND THE PEACE JUBILEE.

WE publish this week several illustrations connected with Boston, to which attention has lately been attracted by the mammoth Jubilee. Not the least interesting of these is the photographic view of the city reproduced in our double-page cut.

Boston, the capital of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and the chief city of New England, is situated at the western extremity of Massachusetts Bay. The first settlement was made there in 1630. Boston was named after an English town founded by the Saxon St. BOLPH, A.D. 654. The capital of Puritanism thus derives its name from a Roman Catholic saint. The progress of the city was slow. In 1638 it was called a hamlet, and had but 20 or 30 houses. In 1671 there were three meetinghouses, and the town was considered rich and populous, containing about 1300 families. In no part of the British empire was the revolution of 1688 more warmly supported than in Boston. In 1692 the witchcraft delusion raged as in other parts of New England. An Englishman who visited the city about that time spoke of the buildings being like the women, neat and handsome; and of the streets being of pebble, like the hearts of the men. In 1708 a list was made of all the streets, lanes, and alleys, which were found to be 110 in number. Long Wharf was commenced in 1710, running 800 feet into the harbor. In 1740 WHITEFIELD preached in Boston to immense crowds; his farewell discourse was attended by 20,000 persons.

In the opening scenes of the Revolution Boston took a more prominent part than any city in the Colonies. After the establishment of Independence Boston had a commerce extending to nearly every part of the world. It was made a city in 1822. Its population then numbered about 45,000 souls. In 1850 it was 61,392; in 1840 it was 93,383; in 1830 it was 136,884; and in 1860 it had increased to 177,840. This number would be nearly doubled if we add the population of Charlestown, Chelsea, Roxbury, Cambridge, Dorchester, Somerville, North Chelsea, and Winthrop.

The position of the city is highly favorable to commercial pursuits. The harbor contains 75 square miles, and receives the waters of the Mannatticut, Neponset, Mystic, and Charles rivers. The harbor affords ample advantage for 500 ships of the largest class.

The city is supplied with water from Lake Cochituate, 20 miles west.

Boston has made more noise than any city of the Union. It is the first article of the creed of Boston thinkers that that city is the centre of human civilization—that Boston is the "hub of the Universe." Now that she has had the biggest concert of all history—we refer to the recent Musical Jubilee—she will henceforth consider herself as the centre of the "music of the spheres." We expected to hear the "anvil chorus" in New York, but were disappointed. Still, the Jubilee was a great success. The programme was carried out without difficulty. The rendering of the symphonies and oratorio music was excellent, and the grand chorus was a remarkable success. We give portraits on this page of CARL ZERAHN, conductor of the symphony and oratorio music, and also of EBEN TOURJEE, the organizer of the choruses.

In connection with this Jubilee one thing is noticeable—and that is the death which occurred on the 17th. In the ancient theatres, where over 30,000 people were assembled, both births and deaths were of frequent occurrence. It is not wonderful, therefore, that in an assemblage of sixty thousand there should have been a single death.

Well, the Jubilee is over. It is now a part of the history of noise-making Boston. Our artist, Mr. BUSH, has on page 420 illustrated the finale of the whole affair.

GOVERNMENT AMONG SWINE.

THERE IS no confusion in the wide domain of organic life, although the short-sighted in Philosophy may fancy that nature conducts her affairs as much by hap-hazard as by orderly displays of controlling wisdom.

Domesticated hogs are proverbially stupid brutes. Their unsatisfied appetite, omnivorous taste and sluggishness when food is abundantly provided for them, are the secrets of their utility, because through these perverted instincts they can be fattened into monsters. Left to themselves, however, excessive multiplication has a tendency to shorten their rations, so that wild hogs are usually tall, lank, lean, and ferocious. Under certain conditions wild boars become formidable animals. Their tusks project like sharp hooks, enameled at the points, and keen as chisels, which they use in defense of themselves or companions when menaced by man or beast, exhibiting in fight boldness and skill that often drives mounted sportsmen from the field.

Undisturbed by foreign foe, ranging freely about at certain seasons, the boars have fearful battles with each other. One or two of a herd come out of the conflict victorious; and ever after, while their vigor remains, are undisputed masters of their subjugated rivals, mingling among them without danger of further collision when the claim of supremacy has once been conceded.

By the operation of this universal law, nature secures the best standard of health and animal perfectability. She forbids the propagation of a generation from a feeble ancestry.

STRAWBERRY CULTURE IN NEW JERSEY.

THE first supply of strawberries that reaches the New York market is sent from as far south as the Carolinas. As the season advances, Norfolk is the point from which the fruit is shipped for New York. It is not until the first week in June that the choice berries, grown upon the fruit-farms of New Jersey, are sufficiently ripe for shipment. At this season numbers of women and children make their appearance in the vicinity of such fields as the one shown in our sketch; engagements are made to pick through the season, which comprises the strawberry, raspberry, and blackberry crops.

The price paid to pickers is usually about two and a half cents per quart; the pickers bounding themselves, but receiving quarters and fuel from their employers. Many women earn as much as two dollars per day, the children not quite so much, owing to their lack of physical strength; for strawberry picking is not so easy a labor as might be supposed.

Many of the women bring their babies with them into the field, and the little covered carriages are to be seen in all directions. Each picker is supplied with a tray and a number of baskets. When these are filled they are carried to what is termed the picking-shanty, where a new supply of baskets are received; also tickets giving credit to the bearer for picking one quart of strawberries. As these "singles" accumulate they are changed for tickets representing twenty quarts; they may be cashed each evening or not, at the pleasure of the holder. As fast as the filled baskets come in they are packed in crates and loaded upon wagons for shipment to the nearest depôt or market.

The scene shown is upon the fruit-farm of Friend WILLIAM PARRY, located in the Township of Cinnaminson, Burlington County, New Jersey. It is said to be, and probably is, the most complete farm of this kind in the State. Mr. PARRY has fifty acres in blackberries, fifty in raspberries, and a large number in strawberries.

The soil is sandy, and for corn would be unprofitable; but the yearly revenue from the present crops is many thousands of dollars. The favorite varieties seem to be the "Wilson's Early," "Agriculturist," "Romeyne Seedling," "Jack Downing," etc. The "Romeyne" and "Jack Downing" (the latter a new variety from Kentucky) are late berries, and particularly admired by marketmen for their solid flesh and full flavor. These are the last berries that reach our New York market.

THE UNDERGROUND KING.

A Slavonic Legend.

I.—THE WHITE DUCK.

ONCE upon a time there lived in a certain country a great king named Tsar Berendi, who had such a long beard that it hung down to his very knees. He had been long married, but had never had any children, and this vexed him very much; till one day he was so distressed at the thought of having no one to succeed to his throne that he determined to set out and travel over his whole kingdom, in the hope of diverting himself while hunting, or simply off he started, and having traveled about for a long time he turned his fore homeward, and was nearing the town in his capital, when, one terribly hot day, he found himself in the middle of a great wide plain with not a drop of water but in his flask to quench his thirst. He was dreadfully thirsty, began to look about in all directions for a stream or spring wherein he might quench his thirst, and at last, to his great delight, espied a clear springing well. In a moment he had jumped off his horse, and was running full speed toward the well, and when he reached it the first thing he saw was a golden goblet floating on the surface.

"Not a bit!" thought the king, and he stretched out his hand to take it; but the goblet was too quick for him, and slipped through his fingers. He clutched at it again and again, now with his right hand, now with his left, and then with both at once, but the goblet still glided away, and at last dived, like a fish, right down to the bottom, and then came up again.

"Why," said the king, somewhat angrily; "I'll have a drink for all that, without asking your help!" and with that he threw himself on his knees beside the well, and put his head down and took a long draught, not observing that the whole of his long beard was hanging down into the water. But this was drunk enough, and as he wished to rise again, he suddenly felt that something had caught him by the beard, and would not let him go. He pulled and tugged, and attempted to get away—but all in vain; the thing, whatever it was, held him fast. He was caught, and could not move at all about it.

"What's that? Let go!" cried he. There was no answer, but all at once, as he looked into the well, he saw in its depths a huge face, which grinned and put out its tongue at him. At the same moment he caught sight of several enormous crab-like claws, which were clenched on his beard, and held him down.

"King Berendi," said the face, "if you wish me to let you go, you must promise to give me that thing which you possess without being aware of it."

"What can that mean?" thought the king; "it seems to me that I know all my possessions—he must be joking!" "Very good," cried he, aloud, "it's a bargain!"

"See that you remember your promise, then," answered the face, and disappeared.

The king, rejoiced to find himself once more at liberty, mounted his horse and set off homeward at full gallop. When he reached the palace the first thing he saw was the queen standing on the great steps, looking eagerly for his coming; and beside her stood the Lord Chamberlain, holding a cradle covered with cloth of gold, in which lay the little baby. Then the king guessed the meaning of his strange bargain, and gave a deep groan. "That, then, is the possession which I myself have knowingly!" thought he. "You have destroyed me, you villainous sorcerer!" and he was sorely distressed; but, putting a good face on the matter, he took the child in his arms, carried it into the palace, petted it for a while, and put it carefully back with his own hands into the cradle.

King Berendi said not a word about his adventure, but set himself to rule as before, considering his little son as his own child; but that promise was ever in his mind, and he lived in constant dread of some one coming to carry his son away. However, time went by without any thing of the kind happening; the prince, to whom his father gave the name of John, grew up into a very fine, handsome young man; and every thing went on so well that at last the old king quite forgot all about Nicholien him.

Now it chanced one day that Prince John, while out hunting, lost his way, and at last found himself in a circle of gloomy-looking pines, in the midst of which stood a vast lime-tree, with a huge, broad trunk, down the middle of which ran an immense chink. As the prince stood gazing, out of this cleft came creeping a strange-looking, ugly old man, with a bright green beard, and eyes greener still.

"Good-morning, Prince John," said the old one; "I have already been waiting a long time for you."

"And who are you?" asked the prince, very much astonished.

"You'll find out before long," answered the other; "but now go back to your father, give him my compliments, and tell him that it is high time to remember and fulfill his promise to me. Good-by—au revoir."

Back went Prince John, not a little puzzled at this adventure, and he told his father the whole story. Then the poor old king, in his distress, forgot himself, and let out the whole secret; but the prince did not seem much troubled at what he heard.

"There's no great harm done yet," said he, "but it's time to be doing. Give me a horse and let me set off, and mind you tell no one what has happened; but if I do not come back within a year, then be sure that I am no longer alive."

So Prince John got ready for his journey, and bade every one good-by. The king gave him a suit of golden armor, a sharp sword, and a raven-black horse; and away he went merrily enough. For three days he traveled onward, and on the evening of the fourth he came to a broad, smooth lake, the clear water of which mirrored the green banks that everything it. In the lake were swimming thirty white ducks, and on the grass lay thirty white dresses. The prince heard them talk home, and, creeping softly to the bank, snatched up one of the dresses and hid himself behind a thick bush. Meanwhile the ducks went on swimming and diving and plashing about in the cool clear water, till at last they all swam up to the bank in a row, and, throwing off their skins out upon the grass, and hurrying up to the dresses put them on; when they suddenly changed into pretty girls, and vanished. But the thirtieth duck remained in the water, flapping about the edge of the lake and crying out piteously, as if in search of something which it had lost. When the prince saw this he was sorry for the trick he had played, and came out of his hiding-place. The duck flew to him, head and all, and, with a human voice, "Prince John, give me back my dress, and I will be of service to you;" and he had no sooner obeyed her than she took her beside him stood a beautiful young lady, robed in pure white, and with long ship's in her hair, and her silken eyes. She gave him her hand, and said to him, "It is well for you, Prince John, that you have known me in my true shape, and let me ungrateful. Know that I am Princess Mary, one of the thirty daughters of the Underground King. My father has always been my enemy for you, and is very angry; but you need not be afraid of him, only mind what I tell you. As soon as you enter the Underground Palace, on your knees and crawl right up to him. He will begin to scold and make a great to-do; but never mind him, go on crawling, and you will see what will happen then."

Princess Mary stamped on the ground, and suddenly the earth split open and appeared before them, and they descended together into the Underground Kingdom, and stopped in front of a palace, which was all built of red garnets, and sparkled brilliantly.

II.—THE THREE TASKS.

PRINCE JOHN went boldly into the palace and saw the Underground King sitting on his throne, with elows on his hands instead of fingers, and small green eyes that glittered like emeralds. Down went the prince on his hands and knees. The king stamped, and screamed, and scolded at him; but he, remembering the counsel of Princess Mary, kept crawling on till—bump!—he ran round it, and ponds, minnows. If you can do it, I'll give you best thanks; but if you fail, I'll cut off your head off. Now be off with you, and good-night; it's already late."

"Ah! the old wretch!" thought Prince John; "see what a plan he has hit upon!" and he went into the room which had been given him in the palace, and sat down very dismally, not knowing what to do. Suddenly a bee flew up to the window, buzzed against the glass, and cried, "Let me in!" Prince John did so; but instead of the bee, in floated Princess Mary.

"Why, Prince John, what are you looking so grave about?" asked she.

"It's not my fault if I'm grave," said he; "do you see what a piece of work your father has set me? And what is more, if I can't do it, he's going to cut my head off!"

"Don't trouble yourself about that, my dear prince," said the young lady; "just go to sleep, and the palace shall be built all right. All you have to do is to get up early, and give a tap on the wall with this little hammer."

And sure enough, every thing happened just as she had said it would. The tap of the hammer threw stock the new palace all complete; and the Underground King, when he came back and saw it, was not a little astonished.

"Well, you're a clever fellow, without joking," said he. "However, let me see how you are as sharp at guessing as you are skillful at work. To-morrow I'll range my thirty daughters in a row, and you must softly put your hand upon, and the third time point out my youngest daughter, Princess Mary. If you can't do it, off goes your head."

Prince John went to his room, and sat down to think. "Come," said he, "the old scarecrow has contrived to himself this time! what difficulty can there be in pointing her out?" Then in fluttered the princess again, and said, "Just this difficulty, that the whole thirty of us are exactly alike; my father himself can only tell us by our dresses, and to-morrow we shall be all dressed alike."

"And what am I to do, then?" asked Prince John, dolefully.

"I'll tell you; I shall be that one on whose cheek you see a small fly. Good-night—au revoir."

The next day, when Prince John was sent for, there stood the thirty princesses in a row, all dressed exactly alike. "Now, my clever friend," cried the king, "be so good as to walk past these young ladies three times, and then pick me out Princess Mary."

The prince stepped forward, and passed by them the first time; a curious promenade, upon my word! But no fly. He went by a second time—still no fly. Prince John's head began to feel very loose upon his shoulders; but he gathered all his courage, and passed for the third time. And behold! there was the fly sure enough, though he could only just see it. He pointed to the beauty with the fly, and said, "This is she—Princess Mary!"

"Oho! there's something wrong here!" grumbled the king. "You have found her out, it's true; but I suspect foul play somewhere. Now be off, for you'll be wanted again before long. I'm going to cut the hay in the meadow, and while it is burning you must stitch me a pair of boots with a braid, without stirring from the spot. If you can't do it, off comes your head!"

The prince went back to his room more dismal than ever, but Princess Mary was already there, and inquired the cause of his trouble. "Cause enough," he replied; "your father has devised a new piece of work for me—I'm to stitch a pair of boots while he cuts the grass. I a cobbler, pray? I am a king's son, and would rather die than go stitching boots for him!"

"Dear Prince John," said the princess, "will you be my husband? I will try to save you—are you willing? We will escape together, or perish together!"

Prince John thought this a very good idea, and agreed at once.

"We must fly instantly," said the princess; and leading Prince John out of the room she locked the door, and put the key ever so far off. Then, taking the prince by both hands, she rose up in the air with him, and they found themselves in the same lake whence they had descended into the Underground Kingdom. Prince John's horse was straying about the meadow; and when the prince and lady came to prance and neigh, and came gallloping up to him. The prince wasted little time in thinking, but leaped on the horse, as the young lady behind him, and went off at full gallop.

Meanwhile, at the appointed hour, the king went to call the prince. The servants found his door locked; and when they tapped at it, a voice like the prince's answered from within, "I'm coming, I'm coming." They went to tell the king, and he waited and waited—but no prince. He sent again, and again there was the same answer; but still no prince did not appear; till at last the king got angry, and bade them drag him out by force. The servants broke open the door, and found nobody there, so they went and told the king that Prince John was nowhere to be found. The king was so much out of all the news that he all died of vexation. "Quick, and pursue him!" roared he; "if he escapes, it shall be the worse for you all!" So his men started in pursuit.

The fugitives were still galloping along, when the princess said, softly, "I hear a trampling." The prince leaped down, put his ear to the ground, and cried, "Yes, here they come, and close after them I see—there's no time to be lost," quoth she; and forthwith she turned herself into a river, Prince John into a bridge, and the horse into a fish, and away beyond the river the highway split into three roads. The king's men followed the fresh hoof-marks, making sure of overtaking the fugitives; but at the bridge they stopped short, for there the traces suddenly ended, and the road split in three. There was nothing for it but to go back and tell the king of their ill success. The king flew into a worse rage than before. "Donkeys!" roared he, "don't you see that they were the bridge and the river? How was it that you didn't find that out? Off with you—and bring him back, do you hear?" The messengers started again.

"I hear a trampling," whispered the princess; and Prince John, after listening a moment, replied as before, "Yes, here they are close upon us!" Instantly the pair vanished, horse and all; and in place of them appeared a dense forest, through which ran roads and paths innumerable; and in the midst of the forest there was, as it were, the gate of a palace carrying two riders. The king's men reached the wood, saw (as they thought) the two runaways, and made all speed to overtake them. But after the pursuers, and you would have thought that in another moment they must seize the unlucky pair; but no such thing. The horsemen looked about them and found themselves at the entrance of the Underground Kingdom, in the very place whence they had started. Here they had in a moment every thing had disappeared—horse, riders, thick wood, and all.

The pursuers returned empty-handed; and the king, when he heard what had happened, went into a worse passion than ever. "I'll give it to you, you lubbers!" screeched he. "My horse, quick! I'll go after him myself and see whether he can give me the slip!" So the Underground King himself started in pursuit.

A third time the princess whispered, "I hear a trampling;" and Prince John dismounted to listen.

"They're coming," said he, "and pretty close, too; but somehow the trampling sounds much louder than it did before."

"Oh dear!" said she, "this must be the Underground King himself who is coming after us; but, at all events, yonder is the boundary of his kingdom, and beyond that he can not go. Once we get past it we are safe."

The moment they reached the boundary line Princess Mary changed herself into a cave, Prince John into a hermit, and the horse into a post, on which hung a little bell. At that minute the Underground King and all his men came galloping up.

"Have you seen any one pass this way, my good old man?" asked the king of the pretended hermit.

"To be sure," answered the hermit; "just this minute a young man and woman came riding by, both upon one horse. They came into my cave to rest, and when they went away told me to swear I hadn't seen them in case I happened to fall in with you."

"Well, there's nothing to be done," said the Underground King, seeing that by this time Prince John was fairly out of his reach, "my daughter may marry him if she likes. There's no denying it, he's a fine lad of a prince." And he turned his horse's head, and rode home again.

In the mean time Prince John and Princess Mary, having no longer any pursuit to fear, went quietly on their way to the country of Tsar Berendi, where they were received by the king and queen with such joy as neither had ever felt before. There was no time lost in declaration; first came a grand feast, and after the feast a wedding. Prince John married the lovely Princess Mary, and they lived thenceforward happily and prosperously. Prince John helped his father to govern the kingdom. Every thing went smoothly and well—and that is the end of the story.

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

I HAVE one of the WHEELER & WILSON Sewing Machines, which has been in constant use for the past fifteen (15) years. It has never been repaired, and sewing is in good order, and is equal for all kinds of work to any machine I have yet seen. It has been used in making heavy clothing, from sailing all summer, to family sewing, and I think it gets better every day.

IMPORTANT FACT.

We see that persons of strong constitutions, and young, suffer for days with pains of the limbs, loss of appetite, and fever, who suddenly get well after a colic followed by slimy, bilious stools. The relief produced by these evacuations wore the original guide to the idea and practice of purgation, and which, when enforced by Brandreth's Pills, always benefits, usually cures, and often prevents disease, especially Scarlet Fever and diseases of similar character.

I. L. Cook, publisher of the "State Banner," Bennington, Vt., says Brandreth's Pills cured him of Dyspepsia, after being afflicted with it over five years. His friends and doctors considered his recovery impossible; but six boxes of Brandreth's Pills restored his health perfectly.

A young lady of Mount Pleasant was sorely troubled with Tape-Worm. All advice and medicine failed to help her. She had no rest. Thin, careworn, and unhappy, she looked the picture of misery. At last she concluded to try Brandreth's Pills. In one year she took seventy-two boxes. They brought away, according to her computation, over two hundred yards of tape-worm. At length all her bad symptoms left her: she slept and ate naturally, and her health become fully restored.

ADDRESS TO SMOKERS.

In reply to the many inquiries made daily in regard to Meerschaum Pipes, we wish to state that we recommend, especially for those who are using for the first time, the pipes Hungarian and Egg Bowls, with Weichsel Stems, they hold the most tobacco, and are the most durable and at the same time practical ones, being the easiest to clean. Or the Hamburg Bowls, having the largest surface to throw color. For tasteful and great smoking, we recommend the London Straight and London Bend.

Being represented extensively throughout the country by our goods, we are desirous to have our Pipes which are considered equaled by none—still more extensively used by those who relish a good smoke, and find Cigars too expensive. Therefore we have reduced our prices to the following rates:

We will sell A No. 3 Pipe for $5, and charge $1 additional for every number higher; therefore No. 8 costs $6; No. 9, $7; No. 10, $8, &c. Pipes from No. 4 to No. 8 are considered full-sized ones; from No. 9 upward, large ones. In the price is included a Case and Stem.

We have also other Meerschaum Pipes for Weichsel Stems, which we will sell at lower prices.

We send by Express to collect on delivery, amount and charges; but suggest that the amount be sent in Registered Letter or Post-Office Money Order in advance, to save the express-return charges.

In conclusion, we wish to state that we warrant all our goods (which we stamp with our name) to be real Amber, genuine Meerschaum, and to color, and will readily give every information in regard to it, based on thirty years' experience in the trade, having received our Diploma in 1839 by the respective commissions in Europe; and we will ever uphold the fair fame we have acquired in the introduction of the MANUFACTURE OF GENUINE MEERSCHAUM GOODS into this country.

We cut Pipes and Cigar-Holders of any shape or design mount them, do repairing, boiling, and polishing. Also, Amber Work done. And, main of all, do not charge exorbitant prices. For reference, we are in possession of commendations from thousands of our customers, representing all classes of society.

THE MEMORY OF SEVENTY-SIX.—Drawn by W. S. L. Jewett.—[See Page 434.]

THE MEMORY OF SEVENTY-SIX.

PAEONS an old man who was a soldier in his youth—
Who fought in Seventy-six—he thinks that he lived,
In truth,
In the Heroic Age of the Nation. For he knows no time so grand
As that of the Revolution—the Seed-time of the Land.
In his thought no later heroes have such bright laurels won,
That they should stand by the side of his peerless Washington.
No! The old battles were the greatest—the old heroes were the best!
So he clings to his rusty rifle, and recalls the martial zest
That moved him and his comrades, at Concord and Bunker Hill,
To meet and fight the British with firm, undaunted will.

His children have heard the story, and now their children hear—
One sits upon his knee; the others are gathered near,
One little maiden wearing the Continental hat,
While Charlie, thinking of "the Fourth," is pleased by Grandpa's chat,
Fashions his wooden sword—the ferocious little wight—
He wonders if the British would stand another fight!

It is a long, long story that the old soldier tells:
But the period upon which most lovingly he dwells
Is not that of Saratoga's victory, but those hard days of the war—
Before the French came over, and when hope seemed very far—
The days of Seventy-six that tried the sternest men.
When the British were triumphant, beaten again and again,
Driven out from Long Island and beyond the Delaware,
And encamped at Valley Forge in that winter of Despair.

"But what was the old war for?" asks Charlie, wonderingly.
"I will tell you in a word," answers Grandpa: "Liberty and Independence—harsh words to tyrants' ears—
At least to King George and his Lords they seemed so, for they inspired
That the lazy old Lords wasted so much of the people's moneys,
That they had to oppress their poor and e'en to tax the Colonies.
They tried to write stamped paper, but their agents we sent home;
They voted a tax on teas and the products of the loom:
But the teas which they sent over were in Boston Harbor thrown,
And our citizens grew content with suits of plain home-spun.
Then the "Red-coats" came, and were quartered in the homes of the free-born,
And the blood of New England rose up, and her face was flushed with scorn.
It was not money we cared for, laid, we fought for the sacred truth:
And what like British insolence can touch the strength of youth!
The English were not all against us in this field of bloody work:
We found champions in brave Barry, in Chatham, and in Burke:
These were leaders of the people, to whom Liberty is dear:
And they helped us by their courage, speaking words of cheer.
But Yorktown and Saratoga, and other victories won,
Taught Britain more than her statesmen, and so the work was done.
We gained our Independence by deeds and not by words—
Not through compromise, but courage and the strength of our brave swords."

This is the old man's story; its moral is never too late:
That of LIBERTY, HONOR, COURAGE we should ne'er quench our hate.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 10, 1869.

THE PARTIES.

THE Republican Conventions of Maine, Ohio, and Pennsylvania have lately made their various State nominations, and their action was of the kind that shows great party unanimity. The present Governors of the three States were renominated, and the manifesto of each Convention is mainly a resolution to hold fast by the same principles as the pending Fifteenth Amendment the Ohio and Pennsylvania Conventions are very emphatic, urging its ratification; while Maine having already ratified has sufficiently expressed its opinion. The other resolutions are very much what we suggested last week they were likely to be. The Maine Convention pronounced especially for the Legislative care and development of the resources of the State, and particularly of the ship-building interest, while Pennsylvania reaffirmed its adhesion to its protective resolution of 1866. The Ohio Convention forcibly arraigns the late General Assembly in which the majority was Democratic. But none of them take any foolish position upon the English or Cuban questions. Indeed, the platforms are very discreet, and rather unusually free from Bancombe.

Simultaneously with the wise action of the Republican Conventions we have the pathetic hope from the Democratic journals that the managers of their party are about to show that sagacity which for many years they have not shown, and the prayer that some things may be considered settled even by a Democratic Convention. In the light of experience such a hope and prayer are wholly unreasonable. The instant that the Democratic party dares to appeal to ignorance and prejudice which the agitation of the negro question furnishes, the simple inquiry for every voter will be whether the Democratic party is likely to offer a more faithful treatment of the reconstruction policy, and a more generally economical and discreet administration than the Republican party. This is a question to be decided by experience and comparison, and it is one from which the Republican party will certainly not shrink.

It is difficult to speak of Democratic principles and policy; for what are they? Kentucky is a thoroughly Democratic State, because of the disfranchisement of part of the population, which is indeed a Democratic policy. But is there any thing in the condition of Kentucky that is so superior to that of Ohio, for instance, that the people of Ohio should wish to exchange? New York is an overwhelmingly Democratic city, and Chicago is Republican. Is Chicago anxious to fall into Democratic care? Do the people of Ohio and the citizens of Chicago suppose that their taxes would be lighter if they were delivered over to the supervision of Tammany and of Messrs. SWEENEY, TWEED, and HALL? Has the Democratic party, as such, ever been renowned as for superior honesty and economy? Is the character of the great mass of its supporters such as to promise a higher tone in politics? Are the antecedents and training of the party such as to inspire confidence in its devotion to the principles that have triumphed in the war and at the polls?

The very appeals to which we have spoken answer all such questions. The most strenuous and excited exhorter to a change of the tactics of the Democratic party is the New York World. Yet, for obvious reasons, that paper is not a fair representative of the party, and is therefore not trusted, except with great reservation. However clever and amusing its treatment of political questions may be, it is felt not to express the average feeling of the party. But its position is stronger than it was a year ago. Then the entire possession of certain settled points and the nomination of Mr. CHASE, with an anti-repudiating platform. In every point in which the Democratic party is the steady old managers, and the World had its revenge by seriously urging the party to change front at the very moment of the final charge. That and, of course, rested upon it in the curses of its party leaders and associates; but as the rout of its party at the polls was prodigious, despite of the diligent fraud in this State, by which its candidate for Governor was apparently elected, the World had clearly gained the advantage of the position of I-told-you-so.

Nevertheless, the New York World this year goes no further than it went a year ago. It advises its party to assent to the colored vote since it can not prevent it, and to try to persuade some of the new voters to its own side. And it says that if the party can only gain power under the present system it can probably maintain it. But, even with a national victory, the party may not deem it expedient to derive the negroes of a franchise which is found to be not incompatible with Democratic ascendancy." It then proceeds to speak of overturning hosts of former Republicans. But is there any Republican who supposes that the country, under the present circumstances, will tolerate in any decidency of a party which "may not deem it expedient" to undo the whole work of reconstruction? Is there any conceivable advantage in intrusting the Government to the hands of a party which opposed the war and reconstruction upon the principle of equal rights, and which will base into consideration whether that principle shall be set aside or not? So uncertain is this Democratic guerrilla of the sentiment of its party that it merely hopes the managers will not harness dead horses to the Democratic coach.

But if this party can not even now be trusted not to respect the whole process of reconstruction, is there any especial reason why it should be trusted even if it declares in its Convention that it regards the question as settled? Is it, as we asked a week ago, essentially true? Is the character of the men whom it has trusted with office hitherto such as to inspire confidence in those whom it may choose to call to position hereafter? Is the political career of Mr. HOFFMAN, for instance, from his proclamation as Mayor of the city making election frauds impossible to register as Governor of the State to the Erie bill, such as to persuade any voter who has hitherto distrusted him that he is worthy of confidence? Has any man in the party has the least part of that firmness which can resist questionable counsels? Or what is the Democratic financial policy except an outcry against taxation and incessant gibes at the Secretary of the Treasury? What is its position upon Free Trade? Wait, and see if the Democratic Convention does not commit itself upon it; or whether its cry is not still substantially "FOLK, DALLAS, and the tariff of" any convenient year.

If the most elaborate slanders against every word and act of the President; if the most amusing air of affected pity for the weakness of the Cabinet, in which one member alone, the Attorney-General, outweighs in real force most of the latter Democratic Cabinets together; if the most industrious perversions and smears could bring the Democratic party into power, its advent might be near. But it is only necessary for all honest voters to reflect that the leaders and the mass of that party are what they have been since 1860, and are the heirs of the old traditions, changing their expressions a little to suit the changed exigency of the times, to retain the dominant party in the ascendency which it has so lamentably won, and which, upon the whole, has thus far justified. Not in this generation can the great principles for which three hundred thousand brave men died upon the field of battle be safely committed to the hands of those who denounced the war, encouraged the rebellion, and supported the dogmas by which it was excused. Parties have deeper roots than temporary policies. But since immediate issues and considerations are always persuasive, let every earnest Republican take care that the character of the party does not suffer by any connivance of his.

THE CUBAN CLOUD.

THE vigorous and decisive action of the Administration in dealing with the attempted violations of the laws of the United States meets with general approval. Indeed, the spectacle of the Government idly folding its hands and smiling at the fitting out of hostile expeditions against a friendly power while it was demanding compensation from England for doing the same thing would justly make us the scorn of the world. The fact of the question of the justice or injustice of the relative position of Spain and Cuba. If we are to enter into every war upon the side which we consider just, we must withdraw from all the courts of amity and good neighborhood with other nations. But if, having neutrality laws, we propose to enforce them honestly wherever they are violated, the Government is pursuing the course which is alone consistent with the honor of the nation.

One further step, however, should be taken. There are many who think that intense efforts made in the city of New York and elsewhere to defy the authority and laws of the United States by fitting out hostile expeditions against a friendly nation. It is the duty, therefore, of the President to issue his proclamation warning offenders that that authority can not be defied with impunity, and encouraging all good citizens to vigilance. To recognize the independence of Cuba would be at least manly. To connive at the revolution, while professing regard for the faith of treaties and for international comity would be contemptible. The Administration by its local officers is diligently maintaining the authority of the United States, but there should be no opportunity left for cavilers.

Meanwhile there are two facts to be remembered; one is the continuous success of all intelligence from the island of Cuba, and the other is the evident want of active sympathy in the public mind of this country. That Cuba has been shockingly misgoverned, and that if she can secure her independence she may justly do so, is universally conceded; but that the condition and character of the people inspire any fervent confidence or active improvement in the island can not be asserted. Indeed, the original conviction that the movements of the people would be against the party of annexation, and that the consequence of Cuban independence will be annexation and a very needless and perplexing addition to our own cares and problems, generally chills the public sentiment in regard to the Cuban revolution. To this must be added the density of the cloud that envelops the island. An expedition arrives upon its shores, and we hope that intelligible communication is established, when, lo! it vanishes, and we are left to rumors no more satisfactory than before.

There is some kind of Cuban military headquarters somewhere, at which there is apparently the utmost confidence. It appears that a large part of the island is undoubtedly in sympathy with the revolution; and in that part, outside of the larger cities and towns, there is probably no government. Taxes are not collected, probably, either by the Spaniards or the Cubans, except in the form of forced loans. Courts of law of course there probably do not administer justice. The country is practically without civil administration, overrun by bands of guerrillas and marauders, which scatter at the approach of regular troops. Both parties are, of course, bitterly exasperated, and the war is really to the death. The Provisional Government of Cuba-Libre will soon yield to that of the new Governor-General; and we presume that foreign governments will take no action until that officer arrives and develops his policy.

The demand for recognition of the revolutionary government by the United States is plainly premature, for nobody will pretend that it exercises the functions of a government at any point accessible to us. Should the operations of the new Governor be baffled and the situation remain as it is, it would, however, become a question whether the concession of belligerent rights to the revolutionists might not be a duty as tending to a solution of the difficulty without involving our own neutrality. It is, however, a question. We have never thought it necessary to inquire into the merits of Mexican revolutions and to pronounce for one party against another; or even to recognize equal belligerent rights, although we were quite sure that a positive position might have enabled a result to be reached. The position in Cuba is, indeed, different, because it is not a civil war but a colonial revolution. But unless the United States intend to become a party to it, whatever their wishes and sympathies, they will prefer to await events. To concede belligerent rights to the revolutionists in Cuba would be, of course, the first step toward the recognition of Cuban independence. It is a concession which every nation reserves to its discretion and for the common welfare of nations. It is not to be made until the belligerent has acquired some kind of de facto sovereignty beyond mere control within its military lines. It is, indeed, a question of discretion in its truest sense, and will be so regarded, we may be sure, by the Administration.

COTTON SUPPLY.

THE returns which occasionally reach us from the Government of India impart information of the difficulties attending the cultivation of cotton which is of great interest to the growers of it in the United States. The dream has been indulged in abroad that portions of British India are capable of producing an inexhaustible supply of cotton at prices which defy competition. Recent experience has shown that the Southern States of the Union, with a climate favored by sufficient heat to bring the seed to maturity, and with cold enough to destroy the root, and in their freedom from a regular rainy season, and from long continued and excessive heat, as well as their soil and exposures, possess advantages far superior to those of India.

The cultivation of cotton in the northwestern provinces of India derived its chief stimulus from the recent war in this country. Agra, one of the most important cities of the region, never had a cotton-press until the winter of 1862–63. Now seven wooden presses was there erected; and the newness of the cultivation in that district may be inferred from the fact that a Parsee merchant of Indore, nearly four hundred miles off, carried his unpressed cotton to Agra, and after it was formed into bales, had not only to retravers the road, but in order to reach Bombay to cross the Nerbudda by a three hundred miles farther. Now, however, there are twenty-eight presses with iron screws in Agra alone, and they are scattered also in all important centres.

In 1862–63 the cotton grown in those provinces amounted to 114,000,000 pounds. In 1863–64, during the great crisis, year, the quantity rose to 132,500,000, but in 1868–69 it fell to 44,137,840 pounds. The reason for this variation is thus given: "In 1867–68 prolonged and untimely rain injured the plant and destroyed the pods. In 1868–69 an opposite, but more fatal influence, prevailed.... the long suspension of rain." In 1867–68 the quantity of land thus cultivated in those provinces was 1,286,817 acres, and the yield only 58,115,129 pounds. In 1868–69 the number of acres under this cultivation was 890,388, and the yield only 44,137,840 pounds, or say 50 pounds per acre. The disparity between this yield and that of the cotton lands in the United States is very large, as our production from 6,600,000 acres, the supposed area under cultivation, is about 190 pounds per acre.

The cause of the great portion of India of which Agra is now the commercial centre calls upon Great Britain for a railroad to connect Agra with Bombay, which is well situated on the western coast of the peninsula. With this aid successful competition with the United States is promised, notwithstanding the great distance of the Indian cotton-fields. The length of road to be built on an air line is about 670 miles, but as it deviates into Rajpootan and extends through a difficult country it will be long and expensive. A chief ground assigned for its construction is that most of the cotton raised in the northwest provinces now goes to Calcutta, which is nearer to the cotton-fields, and that it needs to be transported by a long voyage around Cape Comorin; whereas Bombay lies on the west coast, and has between it and the Red Sea but one expanse of water, which is traversed by a straight line and at half the expense that attends the transportation from Calcutta. The opening of the Suez Canal, likely soon to take place, is urged as an additional motive for constructing the road to Bombay.

We lately showed that the region which sends its cotton by way of Calcutta called also for more railroad accommodation; and it is very evident that an enormous outlay is required to enable Great Britain to proceed satisfactorily in the policy of setting up a serious competitor of America. But the recent cotton speculation—action which was pressed upon the Government of India was that of constructing wind-mills for purposes of irrigation—the southwest monsoon to be relied on as the power. It was expected that wells sixty feet deep would be dug on the high elevations intended for this purpose, and that water would be drawn from this depth and delivered into canals directed toward the cotton lands! This is part of the scheme for meeting the competition of the United States, which is favored with adequate rains, which knows no parching of the surface, and which is well traversed with railroads. We are able to supply Great Britain with better cotton than India can produce, and at lower cost, and her efforts in that direction must result in failure, and particularly when the cotton district in the South comes into full harmony with the situation which the war produced.

Competition in the United States, except when peculiar circumstances exist, will ever keep the price of cotton sufficiently low to meet all the remunerative requirements of the English. Although the English manufacturer is now paying a high price for American cotton, it must be recollected that last year much of the English supply was obtained at half the present price, and that when the price rose last year the advantage was not at all shared by the planter, but by the others. There is much justice in the remuneration which the planter now enjoys. It covers his losses on the crop of 1867–68, and enables him to supply all the material which is required for an increased cultivation this season. The true interest of England lies in abandoning the vain attempt to build up a powerful competitor against us in India, and in increasing the crop in the United States up to the full measure which the manufacturing industry of the world requires. The cotton region of the United States is fully equal to this necessity, and wants only encouragement to accomplish the object. It will undoubtedly ultimately grow to these proportions without foreign aid.

The cotton season, which will terminate on the 1st of September, has undoubtedly been thus far unsatisfactory to manufacturers at home and abroad, and although cloth has been lower in proportion than raw cotton, and the most interested efforts have been lately made abroad to lower the price of American cotton, the effort has entirely failed; and hence the English Cotton Supply Association has been stimulated to renewed activity.

But although the planting interest in the United States at the opening of the season was advised to hold back the crop, as to avoid the losses of the preceding year, and this policy has been adhered to, the combination of circumstances which made it successful will seldom occur. The demand, measured by the most annual consumption of cloth, was small; but although the consumers are, as stated in a recent English circular, "careless and indifferent buyers," as they always are at high prices, "the purchases of cotton, knowing the supply to be limited, are careless and indifferent sellers," and particularly as they know that it was extremely difficult to stop the work of mills. The consumption of cloth has been limited on account of the drought abroad, which impaired the means of extensive populations, and partially in the West from diminished sales of grain in expectation of a foreign demand.

This limited consumption, coupled with a high price for raw cotton, has compelled many mills, both in England and in this country, to stop work or work on short time—a measure which could not be avoided; and hence the recent rise in cotton goods of this country. Bleached goods of low and medium grades advanced about three per cent.; unbleached goods and sheetings and shirtings about 15 per cent.; while at the same time raw cotton has advanced here about 14 per cent. The question is deeply interesting how the future will operate upon these points. It involves the extent of the new crop of cotton abroad and at home; the effect of the stoppage of numerous mills upon the raw material and upon cloth; and the power of consumers to purchase which depends on the success of all great industries, and upon the condition of the money market. It is proper to wait for events instead of attempting to indicate the future of this trade.

One reason why the duality of England to control the price of our cotton this season is undoubtedly due to the powerful efforts made by her to put down the price of grain—an object which, temporarily pursued, had withdrawn attention from cotton in which, in previous years, her victories have been easy. The benefits which the result derives from the increase of cotton will be in time shared by the whole country, which ought to rejoice in the return of that section to increased prosperity.

THE FOURTH OF JULY.

IF the Fourth of July is not celebrated in a more agreeable manner than usual the fault will not be that of Superintendent KENNEDY, who issued an order requiring every member of the police to be on duty for the day, and to enforce the laws forbidding the discharge of fire-arms and the use of "snakes," "chasers," and "Roman candles" in the streets. We heard, indeed, one young gentleman remark upon reading the Superintendent's order, that "presently there won't be any Fourth of July at all" if such prohibitions are to be allowed; but we suspect that the disappearance of the festival is more likely to be hastened than retarded by the free use of "double-headers." Instead of being the pleasantest, the Fourth of July is now in the city of New York the most intolerably disagreeable day in the year. It is the day which every body escapes who can, flying into the country to avoid the universal pow wow which it appropriates. But it is also the day when every body would prefer to remain quietly at home and enjoy the festival after a fashion suited to the season; and the order of Mr. KENNEDY adds to some such happy consummation.

This year the anniversary should have an especial interest, for the country is more profoundly at peace than ever before; a peace founded upon the great principles of the Declaration. Last year the day was desecrated by the assembling of the Convention of those who hoped to paralyze those principles a little longer, and to postpone the practical acknowledgment of the equal rights which the Declaration proclaims. And one of the chief causes of national congratulation at this time is that the American people rejected those reactionary counsels, and tranquilly persisted in the path to justice and liberty. While Mr. JOHNSON was President the contest was not decided. Indeed, had he been a man of any ability, he would most seriously have perplexed the prospects of peace in the country; for it has been evident for many years that there could be no peace until the government was justified by the acknowledgment of the truth of the Declaration. Fortunately Mr. JOHNSON'S mischievous hopes and intentions were wholly baffled by the organization served to arouse the people thoroughly, and when his political allies met to contrive the success of his plans, the response of the people was so vigorous and conclusive as to relieve them and quiet them their acceptance not only of the truth, but of the immediate practicability, of the great principles of the Republican party of independence.

For the first time, therefore, since the Declaration was published, it can be truly said that the American Government is fulfilling its intention. That it has reached its full scope we do not say; but it has now accomplished what makes the rest merely a question of time. For the first time we have a President who, Mr. EDWARD EVERETT tried to prove on the 4th of July, 1860—a year before Bull Run—the "success of our Republic." His oration is now but one of the literatures and monuments with which our history is strewn. Mr. EVERETT proclaimed the success of the Republic at the very moment when the fundamental Republican principle was flagrantly violated, and on the very eve of a contest in which that success was to be vindicated at an appalling cost of life and money. In his whole discourse there was not a single word that indicated any consciousness of the actual situation; and in enumerating our weaknesses he does not even mention slavery. Mr. EVERETT lived to see the probable success of the Republic, and to help it during the tremendous struggle; but he died before the political victory had secured that of the battlefield.

But we who salute the rising sun of this Fourth of July have lived to behold the success of the Republic. We live to see it struggling at the same moment with military fury and party hate, and emerging reasonable and resolute. We have lived to see it establishing peace, not by proscription and vindictive severity, but by universal amnesty and the enlargement of liberty. And when the centennial anniversary of the Declaration comes, may it be upon a land whose prosperity is as permanent as the justice upon which it is founded!

FRENCH CÆSARISM.

THE letter of M. DE PERSIGNY upon Cæsarism as the security of liberty is entirely French and very droll. Like every argument for deception it assumes the question throughout. The late signs of disaffection to the empire are not due to the liberal concessions of the Emperor in allowing a questionable freedom of the press, but to the inconceivable weakness of the government, "which allowed a young lawyer to defy the empire." The tongue of a young lawyer then, by a powerful accident, upsets the empire. Is that not a dangerous admission for our Cæsar? To allow free speech is weakness. If the empire is strong, free speech, of course, is repressed. But is that a strong empire in these days which endures only by imposing silence?

Without the terrible severity of BRUTUS and the indomitable courage of PUBLICOLA Roman liberty would have been stifled in its cradle, says M. DE PERSIGNY; and Rome became the greatest people in the world would have remained forever ignored by History." This reminds us of our old Southern orators who, in the most absolute day of slavery, were constantly appealing to Roman and Greek precedents of liberty. M. DE PERSIGNY'S argument is equally absurd. He says that liberty of freedom is to be a counterpart of that of Rome. The republican liberties of Rome were very different from modern republican liberty; but whatever they were they are certainly no precedent for an empire; and the imperial liberties of Rome are tolerably well understood. M. DE PERSIGNY thinks that France is the easiest country in the world to govern upon one condition; namely, that authority is always ready to repress the license that endangers liberty. The criticism or defiance of a young lawyer, for instance, is license which must be instantly repressed by authority. That is to say, whatever the Government does, it is also the Law. NAPOLEON, does not like, is license; and license endangers liberty.

This is the mere repetition of the Austrian story of the last generation. METTERNICH had every advantage. There had been desolating wars, and Europe wanted peace. The Republican experiment in France had been a ghastly failure, and Republicanism had to bear the burden. The United States were obscure. England was still reactive. The Austrians were utterly priest-ridden. The liberal sentiment in politics was never more depressed, and METTERNICH did what he would. With M. DE PERSIGNY he remembered Saurez and PUBLICOLA, and he firmly repressed the license that threatened the liberty of his doing what he chose. But in another world in which LOUIS NAPOLEON undertakes to play METTERNICH'S game. There are those who call him a sagacious man. But do such persons suppose that his dynasty is secure, or that his son will peacefully succeed to the crown? For seventeen years LOUIS NAPOLEON has contrived to balance himself upon the throne he erected. Has it any foundation in the faith or regard of the people? Marshal BAZAINE declares that the army is devoted to the interests of the Napoleonic dynasty. But does the Emperor's commission authorize him to speak for the army?

What is sagacity in a man who aspires in this age to govern a civilized people as their Emperor? Is it not such a comprehension of the character of the people and the circumstances of the nation as will enable him to endear himself to them or to a powerful party of them as the best security of the liberties and interests of their country? No one will pretend that LOUIS NAPOLEON has ever held such a view. He made himself Emperor by the army. His policy has been that basis of the army and support of the mob. This is the very essence of Cæsarism in its lower form—of Cæsarism without a Cæsar. His imperial tenure is as sure as that of any of the Emperors of the Roman Decline, and no more. It is not a proof of sagacity in a man to hold a throne with an army, and in such a way that at the death of servants his most devoted friend must say with DE PERSIGNY: "Nothing in the actual situation should disquiet a government firm and resolute." Such words at such a time are the sense, sense, of the empire.

NON-AMERICAN CITIZENSHIP.

WE have received a memorial addressed to the State Legislature and the school authorities by the Irish-American citizens of the city of New York; and we observe that there is to be a Convention of Irish-American citizens at Chicago on the 4th of July. There are many very excellent suggestions in the memorial, and the Convention, we trust, will acquit itself creditably. But what are the English-American citizens, and the French-American citizens, and the Spanish-American citizens doing in the mean while? Have they no suggestions to make or resolutions to hold? Mr. JOHN M. MORIARTY, of Philadelphia, says that the independent Irish voters must look to the honor, the liberties, and the industries of America. But, pray, what has independent Irish honor to do with the liberties and industries of America? Those are the concern of American citizens, and should not be become as an American citizen has any thing whatever to do with them. But when a man becomes an American citizen he is no longer an independent Irish voter—he is simply an American voter, and need not be ashamed of the name.

One of the most humiliating and ridiculous spectacles ever seen in this country was that of the Mayor of New York masquerading in a suit of green clothes upon St. Patrick's Day. It was "wearing the green" to please the "independent Irish voter." It was the worst kind of demagogy. It was pandering to a feeling that should never be officially recognized. For when the natives of other countries have renounced their political relation to those countries and have become Americans, it is their duty to accept their new political nationality, and to merge their political feelings and interests in those of the country they have chosen. It is an insult to the American people to attempt to influence a part of them as Irish-Americans or German-or English-Americans. What we most need is homogeneity; and if the American people are to be drawn up into various camps of those of English descent and of Irish descent, of German descent and of all other nationalities, that cohesion and identification which are essential to a genuine American national life will be indefinitely delayed.

Moreover, the distinction is meaningless for any good purpose. The fact that certain citizens are of one or of another nativity does not make them a class with peculiar interests in this country. A man is not of liberal or reactionary tendencies in American politics because he was born in Ireland or Germany. All men born in France and naturalized in the United States are not, for that reason, Bonapartist sympathists. The interests that affect American citizens are independent of their birth-place. If an Irishman is naturalized here, it is his duty no longer to regard Ireland from an Irish or English but from an American point of view. His Irishism is an impertinence. If he volunteers advice as an Irishman he should be summarily reminded that Americans can manage their own affairs. If he is not willing to be an American—very well, he may do as he will: but, although born in Ireland, he certainly can not be, like Mrs. Malaprop's Nation, three gentlemen at once. A convention of "independent Irish voters" sitting in Chicago and discussing American politics is preposterous. Why don't independent Irish voters discuss Irish politics in Ireland? When independent American voters wish to confer upon subjects of common political interest they will meet somewhere in Europe, but in America; and we advise Irish voters to reflect upon the great advantage of such a method.

Indeed, until an Irishman or any body born in another country is not willing to cease to be an Irish voter and become an American voter, why is he naturalized in this country, and why does he become an American voter? For social and sentimental purposes he may very well retain the habits and associations of his native land, as for charitable purposes there is a Society of the Sons of New England in New York, and a Society of the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick, and a St. George's Society, and a St. David's Society in the same city. But the Sons of New England are not known as New English-American citizens. If they were they would laugh at themselves. Politically they are American citizens only; and that is a name which needs no qualification.

WE TWO.

BY JEAN INGELOW.

It's we two, it's we two, it's we two for aye,
We will be safe we two, and kind we two in our stay.
Like a laverock in the lift, sing, O bonny bride!
All the world was made once, with five by his side.

What's the world, my lass, my love, what can it do?
I am thine, and thou art mine, life is sweet and new.
If the world should exceed the sea, let it and fret.
For a laverock in the leaze lead, once more we'll try.

Like a laverock in the lift, sing, O bonny bride!
It's we two, it's we two, happy we two side.
Take a kiss from me thy man; now the song begins.
All is made perfect for us, and the leaves have wings.

When the darker days come, and no sun will shine,
Then shall I, my dear, love, be kind to thee and mine.
It's we two, it's we two, while the world's away,
Sitting by the golden shealves on our wedding-day.

"ALL HAIL AND FAREWELL TO THE PACIFIC RAILROAD."
WENDELL PHILLIPS.

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

OUR full-page cartoon on the Pacific Railroad, by Mr. THOMAS NAST, is based upon a philippic recently uttered by Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS. The best explanation which we can give of our illustration, perhaps, is to give a copy of this philippic:

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

All Hail and Farewell to the Pacific Railroad! The telegraph tells us that the Indians have begun to tear up the rails, to shoot passengers and conductors on this road. We see great good in this. At last the poor victim has found the vulnerable spot in his tyrant. "Thank God America has resisted," cried LORD CHATHAM. Our feeling is the same. For seventy years and more the Indian has begged this great nation to attend to his wrongs. His cries have been unheard. Ruthless and unheeding we have trampled him down. To-day the worm turns and stings us.

Last year Indians destroyed locomotives and shot conductors. Timid DENVER forbade the telegraph wires to report the fact. He trembled for his trade. To-day fifteen thousand warriors on the war-path—a thousand miles of exposed road; this railway the pet plaything of the American people! Would our words could reach every Indian chief. We would tell him, lay down your gun, but allow no rail to lie between Omaha and the mountains. "The accursed code" is O'CONNELL'S best weapon, said SHEIL. The Pacific Railway is the Indians' Alabama. Every blow struck on those rails is heard round the globe. Haunt that road with such dangers that none will dare use it.

Some men may think us needlessly aggressive. No, citizenship they may say, would be a better remedy. Yes, by-and-by. At present citizenship means little. Heaven forbid we should betray the Indian to such protection as "citizenship" gives to the Georgia negro and loyalist. No, we are thankful the Indian has one defense that the negro never had. He is no citizen and has the right to make war. Well may he use that last right, and never yield it till "citizenship" means more than it does now.

An Abolitionist may well glory in these Red men. When, in 1865, General SAXMAN carried to the Seminoles the news of emancipation, they instantly set their slaves free. But, more yet than we, they proceeded at once to divide their possessions with them fairly; shared with them their provisions-money, and, last winter, in Washington, were specially earnest to secure such a teacher as these emancipated men would prefer. When two or three years ago SHERMAN'S Commission met the Indians, the Navajoes refused to come into conference unless their women could be admitted on equal terms with themselves to share the debate. Could these men be persuaded to undertake, for a few years to come, the task of reconstruction? What a saving of time! What a saving of honor!

Earnestly do we wish that this nation could rise to the level of once doing an act of justice from pure and single motives of honesty and duty. But it does not seem as if this level would ever be reached in our day. In default of that we rejoice to see the nation scourged to its duty. Long and weary were the years of blood and misfortune that finally broke us into willingness to emancipate the black. May our stubbornness yield sooner and easier in this matter of the Indians! It seems probable. By the time Congress assembles again we think its members will be ready—as they never have been—to listen on this topic. The sad and ponderous documents stored in the Capitol will at last be read; and we shall learn that a nation, by its own confession always in the wrong, must seek some other path out of its troubles than by sending butchers to waste treasure and blood in the vain effort to "exterminate" a braver race than ours. We spent a hundred millions really—fifty confessedly—to "exterminate and remove" the Seminoles from Florida. But there are everglades in Florida to-day where no white man enters, and which the Seminole still holds. If this be the case in Florida with a thousand Seminoles, how likely are we to "exterminate" twenty thousand such, spread over the boundless West? SHERMAN is inventing the glories of Atlanta for defeat, utter and shameful and well-deserved, on the prairies.

"LIBERTY BELL."—(SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.)

"LIBERTY BELL."

THIS bell originally hung in the belfry of Independence Hall, Philadelphia. It is still in that Hall, but not in the steeple; it rests upon a dais, as shown in our cut. BENSON J. LOSSING, in his "Field-Book of the Revolution," thus describes this sacred relic:

"It is four feet in diameter at the lip, and three inches thick at the leaviest part. Its tone is destroyed by a crack which extends from the lip to the crown, passing directly through the names of the persons who cast it. An attempt was made to restore the tone by sawing the crack wider, but without success; the melody of the 'glory-breathed tone' that thrilled the hearts of the people on the birthday of the nation could not be reawakened. The history of this bell is interesting. In 1752 a bell for the State House was imported from England. On the first trial-ringing after its arrival it was cracked. It was recast by PASS & STOW, of Philadelphia, in 1753, under the direction of ISAAC NORRIS, Esq., the then Speaker of the Colonial Assembly..... Upon fillets around its crown, cast there twenty-three years before the Continental Congress met in the State House, are the words of Holy Writ: 'Proclaim liberty throughout all the land and unto all the inhabitants thereof.' How prophetic! Beneath this bell the representatives of the thirteen colonies 'proclaimed liberty.' Ay, and when the debates were ended, and the result was announced, on the 4th of July, 1776, the iron tongue of that bell first 'proclaimed liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof,' by ringing out the joyful annunciation for more than two hours; its glorious melody floating clear and musical as the voice of an angel above the discordant chorus of booming cannon, the roll of drums, and the mingled acclamations of the people."

We give, on the same page with our illustration of "Liberty Bell," a representation of the firing of the British troops upon the citizens of Boston, early in 1775. Our illustration is from a picture drawn and engraved by the illustrious PAUL REVERE, who has been made immortal in LONGFELLOW'S celebrated poem.

The scene occurred in what is now known as State Street, Boston. The British soldiers had conducted themselves with insolence, and had killed a number of citizens; and a mob had gathered together to avenge themselves upon the troops. In the conflict which followed ATTUCKS, a mulatto, was killed. Three other citizens were killed, also, five dangerously wounded, and a few slightly hurt. This was before the Revolution had fairly been entered upon; but it furnishes an indication of the excitement which prevailed in our large cities on account of the uncalled for presence of foreign troops sent from England to insult and oppress Americans.

AUNT MONEYPENNY'S WILL.

I.

ONE sultry August evening, not many summers ago, a young man leaped from the train at Scantleton, and started with a brisk step for the house of his aunt Griselda Moneypenny, which stood upon the hill overlooking the village. Being compelled to cross a stile and take a short cut through a strip of woods, our young traveller nearly alighted upon a bunch of adders, which in the freshness of this sombre glade bloomed thus tardily in the season. He instinctively shrank back, as he saw them, up and trod upon the other side, then, stooping, picked up the trailing branch and sniffed it gently. Not that he was very fond of nature, or for that matter knew one plant from another; but he took a sensuous delight in any thing beautiful in itself, and admired the hues of the faint breeze that rustled the leaves over his head; and the birds twittering melodiously about him delighted his eye with their color, his ear with their song.

And yet to look at him you would not believe he would care for flowers or birds. He was tall and rather ungainly; his hands and feet were large and not particularly shapely; but his face, in spite of his bushy eyebrows, broad mouth, sunburned and freckled skin, was a winsome one—for under the eyebrows gleamed a pair of blue eyes, honest and clear as the sky, and at times singularly like a woman's. Then the lips were well-cut, the teeth firm and white. Descriptions are lame in a case of this kind; but I still maintain that, even in outward appearance, there was something very winning about Arthur Moneypenny.

It was about the time to walk through the old orchard on the left of the house, and skirt around the kitchen-garden to the path that led by the porch. By this means he could avoid the dust of the road, and revel in the sweet breath of the clover, and the knee-high in tried to pick known from his earliest boyhood. Then it was something delightful to see the gnarled old branches, laden with their knotty load of green fruit, and gather in with huge draughts all these delights to cheer his city-burdened soul.

But in all this rich vagabond pleasure he found himself suddenly under the bay-window, and heard distinctly his name uttered in a tone of concern that arrested his footsteps.

"John Moneypenny!" said a fresh, girlish voice. "A red-haired monster! An awkward, freckled lout! You can not be in earnest, Aunt Griselda—you can not mean what you say!"

"But I do, my dear," replied a voice, harsh and unmusical, that John knew was that of his aunt. "It has been a perfect nuisance for years. However, I have always carried perfect liberty for myself—it would therefore be inconsistent to deny it to others. Act your pleasure, my dear; and if you'll take the advice of an old woman you'll 'make hay while the sun shines.' I feel premonitory symptoms in the back of my head at times that will trouble me in my turn, and you know they said another stroke would finish me."

"But, aunt," cried the young girl, and John climbed upon the lower branch of a tree that commanded a view of the sitting-room, "it is possible you may be at least as much upon the world penniless because I refuse to marry a man that is repulsive to me!"

John now could gaze into the room at his ease, and remarked that his cousin Isabel, who had grown out of all reason, and ripened suddenly into a wonderful theatrical creature, was tearing into atoms a lace handkerchief, beating upon the carpet impatiently with her little, arched foot, and darting lightning glances from her brilliant eyes upon the composed figure of his aunt, who, seated in her rocking-chair, purred with the air of an exceedingly ripe and luscious peach, and smiled aboundy upon her agitated niece.

"Could I suppose," repeated Isabel, "after rearing me for a life of luxury, condemn me to drag out my days in poverty, without a friend in the world?"

"No, Isabel; if you were not so impatient you would recognize the justice and forethought of my decision. I would secure you such a friend, girl, as is seldom given to a weak, vain creature like yourself."

"But suppose I refused such a friend; suppose I even hated the sound of his name?"

"Well, considering his name is the same as mine and your own, my dear, I think your remarks are, to say the least, offensive."

"I do hate the name of Moneypenny, despise it, loathe it! To marry a creature like that, without even changing one's name—oh, aunt," she added, pleadingly, "I will not believe you—you surely care a little for me!"

"I have told you," replied her aunt, coldly, "it is my own wish to impale me to the end. Besides, I have a little fondness for the name you mentioned, and naturally desire that what little I have shall be used for its benefit. But you must do as you please, Isabel. I am used to disappointments—only improve the present."

"But how?" asked Isabel, raveling the very threads of her handkerchief. "I know what I can not and will not do; but after that I am powerless."

"Well," replied her aunt, draining the nectar from her peach, "as far as an old woman's assistance can be of any avail, you may count upon mine. Perhaps, under the circumstances, you might make a more agreeable connection; there is young Lascelles!"

A vivid blush burned upon Isabel's cheek.

"Aunt Moneypenny," she cried, suddenly, "how can you torment me so? You know he is perfectly indifferent to me."

"I know the very time I have been able to get to the church young Lascelles has devoured you with his eyes. God forgive me for telling these things at such a time; but old Newell is so dreadfully proxy I was compelled to do something. Why don't you get a crick in your neck and turned it to get a little ease I found Lascelles's eyes riveted upon you!"

"But, aunt, he hasn't been here for a month."

"You mean inside the doors. He has fairly haunted the grounds; and really, Isabel, I think he's afraid to come to the house—he manages in a little repelling, and you are not outwardly the timid, gentle creature we know so well at home."

"You think, then," said Isabel, "that if—" She hesitated.

"I think," interrupted her aunt, abruptly, "that if you manage your cards properly you may be mistress of the De Vigny estate. Now, your eyes will not do it. Mine is a mercenary creature you are, Isabel!"

"It is not his fault if he's rich," said Isabel, demurely. "I will confess that his delicacy and refinement are pleasing to me. I have a fastidious horror of any thing coarse in a male."

"They do not remarked her aunt, "that he puts his hair up in papers every night. You see, he can't have it frizzed with a curling iron, because it injures the hair; and after all the young man is right, for baldness is in the family."

Perhaps that was one reason why young Lascelles's brains were so completely addled. I do not say, Isabel, that idiocy is hereditary in the family; but what I alluded to was baldness.

At that moment a heavy step was heard upon the porch, and the door shook in the grasp of a large and awkward hand.

"There's John," said the old lady, eagerly extending both hands to the new-comer. "Why, you are late for tea, John. Do you recognize your cousin Isabel?"

John grasped warmly the whole hand of his cousin, who had risen hastily to her feet, into the tips of her fingers, and with one fleeting glance devoured the face of the young girl. Hair, eyes, nose, lips, all the components of the face sprang from his blue eyes. Then he turned to his aunt.

"I came through the orchard," he said, "and stopped to look at the old pippins. Do you remember how many pantaloons came to grief in my climbing that tree?"

"Ay, John," replied his aunt, while Isabel, dismayed at this vulgarity, glided out of the room. "But you are late, indeed, have you? I gave you up at half past six."

"If you'll let me help you eat a few of those peaches, I can go back along the pippins."

"Help yourself," said Miss Moneypenny, pushing the fruit toward her nephew, and looking thoughtfully after the retreating form of Isabel. "My idea of what a man should look like," she added, with an emphasis that John well understood.

"Chacun à son goût," said John, burying half of a peach in his huge mouth; "it's not every one that can please you, aunt."

"No," replied Miss Moneypenny, with a frown; "I suppose you haven't the least idea what I would like you to be."

"Well," to tell the truth, aunt, I thought that in your dear old heart you felt that I needed a holiday; and just now they are having a seducing enough to keep me here for a while, if you could only get me away from this city."

"You have got nothing of the kind, John Moneypenny! You know I never shilly-shally about any thing. I'm a few of the old pippins creeping over me, and thought there might be such a thing as my giving out."

"God forbid!" cried the young man, earnestly.

"And I wanted you to come out and make love to Isabel, so that you could marry her immediately! Is that plain enough?"

"Why, Aunt Griselda, do you remember a conversation we had before Isabel came back from her schooling? I told you if I could ensnare the affection of my employer's daughter my fortune would be made."

Miss Moneypenny burst into a sardonic laugh.

"I may as well keep quiet," she said, "and die as soon as possible. You wouldn't suppose love, John, would you, that old parallel like me could cling with such tenacity to a few notions of honor and sincerity?"

"I know," replied John, coming around to her chair, and taking her withered hand in his, "that you will trust your boy to do what is right, and not believe him capable of a meanness."

"You love this woman, then, John?"

"I fear I do, aunt."

"Fear! What do you mean by that?"

"I mean that I love her against my reason; I love her, though I know it is simple madness to do so."

"Well, at all events," said the old lady, with a contented sigh, "I'm glad you love her—glad to hear something in the foolish, old-fashioned style of romance. I like it in her, never fear, if you've made up your mind to it."

"But I don't know that I have made up my mind to it, aunt.

"Thou do so, at once. Poor Isabel! I'm sorry for her, I am indeed. That fascinates such an empty-headed ass; but she's prejudiced."

"Against red hair and freckles, aunt?"

"Yes; but how did you know?"

"I thought so from the way she looked at me." John looked a little sad and grave, but Miss Moneypenny answered, abruptly:

"What matters it, if you love the other woman?"

A clear, sweet note fell upon their ears, then a few chords upon the piano—Isabel had commenced to sing in the drawing-room.

You can wheel me through the hall into the drawing-room, John, if you will. I always listen to Belle a while at night. I find I sleep the better for it. Stay, you are sure you love this woman?"

"Yes, aunt; but why?"

"Well, I had decided to send you away by the early train in the morning—but in that case you may as well stay."

If Miss Moneypenny slept the better for Isabel's singing, it seemed that her nephew slept the worse; for long after his aunt was snoring, and Isabel wandering in dream-land, poor John paced and re-paced, and finally arose, dressed himself, and looked out of the window at the stars. Star-gazing and John Moneypenny! Singular conjunction!

II.

A FEW weeks after John's arrival at his aunt's house at Scantleton Isabel arose rather early and assisted her aunt in the morning toilet.

"Isabel, my dear," said the old lady, continuing a conversation which had evidently ruffled a little the temper of the niece, "don't tear the few wisps of hair I have left out by the roots; you can not drag the realization of your hopes from my poor scalp. I tell you the man is simply lazy."

"And I tell you," replied the girl, touching more lightly the gray hairs of her aunt, "that he is an idiot!"

"Oh, I hope not!" interrupted her aunt, seriously.

"How literal you are, aunt," said Isabel, brushing again vigorously. "I don't mean, of course, that he is absolute fool; but yesterday we went out to the summer-house, and he begged me to bring a book and read to him, speaking in the most elaborate manner of my talent in that way. I commenced 'Elaine,' and he threw himself at my feet in the most graceful attitude, with his great head upon my knee, as if drinking in every syllable that I uttered. I became interested in my reading as I usually do in the delights interview with the queen I raised my voice; a movement at my feet arrested my attention. De Vigny was just opening his eyes—he had been asleep!"

"Well, in this case," said the old lady, "I can't say I blame him. Any one whose wits sleep or reading is the most soothing thing in the world—there is a sort of magnetic power about it."

"An excellent soporific!" said Isabel, sarcastically.

"A very good quality for a voice," replied her aunt. "When you have learned the value of sleep you will appreciate the compliment. I know a woman who will sleep leaping it sets my teeth upon edge to think of it."

"You mean De Vigny's, aunt; and as I am compelled to remain here you might make it as pleasant for me as you can."

The old lady cast an appealing glance upward.

"How unreasonable you are, Isabel! Didn't I been a martyr to your interests? Haven't I sat hour after hour and listened to his description of his estate in Italy? Haven't I even endured the twang of his guitar? and upon that night you and John pretended to get lost I fell asleep out of sheer exhaustion and weariness; and just when my poor tired brain began to get quiet, young Lascelles would break into a shrill remark, at most considerate to leap out of my chair. At last I begged of him to go in search of you, protesting I was dying with sleep. The moment he was gone I fell back, completely worn out, and never moved till you returned. Soporific! It's the very thing for insomnia, and you'd be in your grave a twelvemonth after you were married to Lascelles!"

"I had a delicious night that was!" murmured Isabel, a soft dreamy light stealing into her eyes. "John and I had been walking—miles, I think—through the grounds of the water. Climbing over rocks and hollows, through bushes and briers, we made our way. When we reached a little knoll on the summit of the water. Climbing over rocks and hollows, through bushes and briers, we made our way. When we reached a little knoll on the summit of the water. John fairly picked me up in his arms and carried me over—"

"Hum-m!" murmured the old lady.

"He is the handsomest man in the world!" said Isabel, boldly; then added, plaintively, "You know, aunt, I never had a brother."

"Ah, child, child!" said the old lady, "I don't believe you remember your mother; why not mourn the loss of your female relatives?"

"Because, aunt," replied Isabel, coaxingly, "you have sufficient me for all of these; and then, I was so young when I lost my mother that I were the only one that loved him in the world. I think," added Isabel, scornfully, "that young lady must be very difficult to please."

"Because she don't get enamored of 'a red-haired monster,' an 'awkward freckled lout!'"

"You know when I spoke in that hateful way I hadn't seen John for years."

"Oh, then, he ripened into an Apollo while you were separated!"

"No, but he is so brave and yet so gentle—so winning and genial. There is such a touching, childlike confidence in his manner, like one of the old knights we read about. And then when his face is lighted up by that rare smile of his, it becomes almost handsome—"

"Hum-m!" murmured the old lady. Isabel started; a bright color mounted to her brow, and having finished her aunt's toilet, she went out of the room.

The evening of that day John returned from a fishing excursion; and as he passed the drawing-room window the tableau within caused him to pause and glance again. Isabel, dressed simply in white with a single rose in her hair, played a little symphony upon the piano. By her side, and bending a little over her, was the slight figure of Lascelles. Dressed immaculately, his hair parted carefully down the middle, a soft flush mantling in his cheek, he would have made quite a pretty woman. His foot, beating the measure upon the floor, scarcely looked larger than Isabel's, and his little white hand fluttered over the music incessantly. Presently Isabel threw her head back and gave a little preparatory cough; then young Lascelles, taking a languishing attitude, and planting his foot into a mincing expression, which caused a wrinkle of merriment to linger about John's lips, sang in a shrill tenor, which sound far above Isabel's contralto:

"My bonnie has she sweth
When she my heart beguileth,
Fa, la, la,
Smile less, dear love, therefore,
And you shall love me more,
Fa, la, la."

At the conclusion of this verse of the madrigal John cast his eyes upon the figure of his aunt, and the wrinkle of merriment expanded into a smile. She had sat perfectly erect in her chair by the window, and held, with untiring tenacity, a hand upon each ear, while an expression of exasperated exhaustion shadowed her face.

John leaped upon the portico, and, before rising the French window, he heard Miss Moneypenny's eyes lighted up when she saw her nephew, and she held out her hands entreatingly.

"Wheel me out upon the balcony," she whispered.

John did as he was requested, and gave but one little glance at the further end of the drawing-room, where Isabel, unconscious of John's arrival, sat upon the piano-stool and listened, with bowed head and fingers hesitating in picking the rose to pieces, to the shrill whisper of Lascelles:

"Cruel charmer! Had you given the rose to me, I would have cherished it forever."

"Shut the window, in Heaven's name," cried Miss Moneypenny; and John pulled down the sash, catching one lightning glance from Isabel's eye.

"I can't stand it," said the old lady. "I'm not so strong as I thought; and that Lascelles will be the death of me. I feel it in my bones."

"He seems a good-natured little chap," said John, condescendingly.

"Oh, I don't know what he means well," replied Miss Moneypenny; "and for Isabel's sake I have endeavored to do my best; but endurance has its limits, and Lascelles is one whom singing of the things that I can not stand. It's bad enough when he talks; but when he sings it really is the most penetrating, rasping thing imaginable! They are quiet now, thank God, or that glass window would no more keep out sound than a sheet of paper. There, it's exasperating to me to look at him! He's commenced to wear a cambric handkerchief around his neck—he'll soon wear a gibbon about his curls."

"I'm afraid you'll take cold out here in the night-air," said John; and, taking off his linen coat, he wrapped it around his aunt.

"And you never take cold!" she said, grasping his hand affectionately by her side.

"You know nothing of sickness, great, strong giant that you are."

"I have known sick sometimes," said John, with an involuntary glance at the window.

"Your skin used to be as black as a berry's when you were quite a lad," murmured the old lady, stroking his brow.

"I'm not thinking of the obnoxious freckles, aunt?" inquired John, a little bitterly.

"If I could only have prevailed upon you to wear a veil—you know I offered them—" aunt added, abruptly, "if you'll wheel me in, I'll go to bed!"

"And so will I," said John, wheeling his aunt through the hall and into her sitting-room.

"Now, if you'll call Abigail," said the old lady, taking John's hands again in her own, and pressing them warmly, "you may go where you please."

"God bless you, dear aunt!" said John, going out upon the hall-door step. "It is time to see Lascelles kiss Isabel's hand, and declare that she had rendered him very happy. Turning suddenly, he threw back his head, and raising an animated, beautiful face to his.

"We have did we get all those splendid fish?" he said. "I wish I had gone with you."

"Weren't you better employed?" said John, with a sarcastic smile.

The color deepened in Isabel's cheek.

"I suppose it would be troublesome to take a woman with you," she replied, with dignity; "and I wouldn't, of course, wish to intrude in that case."

"You might take Lascelles along," replied John, without looking up.

"That would be as bad as another woman," said Isabel, and turning abruptly upon her little heel, she went into her aunt's sitting-room and astonished that old lady by throwing herself down by her side and bursting into a passion of tears.

"God bless me!" said Miss Moneypenny, "what's the matter, Isabel? Has any thing happened to John? I told him to call Abigail, and I've been waiting ever since to be undressed."

"It's nothing about John," sobbed Isabel: "or if it is, he don't care—he's too selfish to care about any thing or any body."

"Hush, child!" said the old lady, smoothing

the beautiful hair of her niece; "you know I'm very fond of John."

"And so am I!" cried the young girl; "and yet I've promised to marry Lascelles, and I hate him! I could n't him!"

"Isabel," replied her aunt, "you are very inconsistent. A little while ago you hated and loathed John, now you are fond of your cousin and hate the other man. Wait a little while, and it 'll come right again: girls are like weathercocks at your age."

"Aunt," persisted Isabel, "I can not marry Lascelles! I will not!"

"Well, you see, Isabel, I don't know how to advise you in this case. John confessed to me he was mad about this other woman."

A hot flush mounted to Isabel's forehead.

"If he asked me this very night to marry him," she interrupted, proudly, "I would refuse him!"

III.

JOHN proposed upon one Wednesday evening a fishing excursion for the following day. Lascelles agreed to the proposition with enthusiasm.

"I never catch any fish, but I like the fun," he said, enigmatically.

Thursday morning dawned bright and clear, and our fishing party were up betimes, and on their way to the little branch of the river that ran at the foot of Da Vigny pasture grounds. At every step of the way the young proprietor regaled his companions with interesting accounts of the vastness of his property, the fertility of his land, the fine condition of his live-stock, and seemed in an excellent humor with the world and all it contained. He wore a broad-brimmed straw hat, with a curiously wrought fishing-basket. Upon his left arm rested a hat of the finest straw, with a prodigiously wide brim; a brown veil was fastened securely about his neck, and his hands were covered with a pair of ornamented buckskin gloves.

"You wouldn't believe," he remarked, as, reaching the river, he seated himself under a tree, "that I shall be burned to a crisp if I go out of the shade. Positive fact, I assure you—but I don't care," he added, hurriedly, "I don't matter if I am."

But Mr. Lascelles, however regardless of receiving himself from the sun's rays, insisted that Isabel should remain under the shadow of the tree, and, adjusting her line gallantly, he led her to a seat under a projecting limb; then rearranging with great precision his rod, they commenced to fish under very comfortable circumstances.

John declared he would try the stream further down, and disregarding an appealing glance from Isabel, proceeded upon his way. Impressing himself upon a rock that completely hid him from his companions, John went earnestly to work. By the absorbed expression of his countenance, and the rapt attention with which he gazed upon the water, he would have supposed he was devoted to the piscatory art; but presently a sudden substance shot out of the stream, and John's line whirled flestly from the reel—our fisherman drew in his prize, but seemed not at all interested, and his face wore the same rapt, care-worn look when he again threw out his line.

An hour or two went by, and the sun was climbing high over his head, when John fancied he heard his name called in a loud, agonizing tone. He dropped his line, started to his feet, and listened:

"John, John!" cried a voice he well knew even when it was strained with agony. "Oh, John, save me!"

With one bound he cleared the rock, and leaping over stones and brambles, soon reached the spot where he had left his cousin and her companion. Isabel was sinking in about eight feet of water under the projecting branch, and Lascelles, in an agony of terror and dismay, stood wringing his hands upon the bank.

"She would get upon the limb," he stammered, "and she fell in. I can't swim a stroke, or I'd jump in; I would indeed!"

John pushed him aside before he had said two words, and throwing himself in the stream, succeeded in reaching his cousin as she was again borne down by the water. It was the work of a moment to swim with her to the shore, and leaving Lascelles to follow as he could, he ran with the insensible form of Isabel homeward.

When he saw the house his heart gave a leap of relief, and he dashed through the hall where his aunt sat dozing in her chair. The old woman fixed a petrified gaze upon John as he hastened with the lifeless form of his cousin up the stairs, and watched him hurry off again, drenched as he was, for the doctor. When John returned with the village Æsculapius, Isabel had already changed her young mistress's clothes and restored her to consciousness.

Then John went to change his dripping garments. Presently Mr. Lascelles came panting up the garden-path, and the doctor spoke like a brute.

But passing through the hall the attention of the physician was arrested by a motionless figure that lay huddled upon the floor.

"God bless my soul," he cried, "it's Miss Moneypenny!"

"O Lord!" said Lascelles, fanning himself with his hat, "she's got a fit! What a day of disasters!"

"Oh, aunt! dear aunt!" cried John, leaping from the stairs, "what is this?" He took the helpless form in his arms and carried it tenderly to his aunt's room.

"Another stroke of paralysis," said the physician, "and I fear it will go hard with her this time. My horse is at the door, I'll go procure something for her relief."

"I'm completely done up!" said young Lascelles. "I think I'll retire also. I'm glad to hear Miss Isabel's better. Call in the evening."

And John was left alone with his aunt.

"Live!" he cried, kissing and caressing her cold and withered hands; "for whom you I am alone in the world!" She opened her eyes, and, gazing upon John, strove in vain to speak, while drops of futile agony stood upon her wrinkled brow.

A light step descended the staircase, and Isabel approached slowly the door of her aunt's room; but John, overpowered with remorse and grief, thought of nothing at that moment but his aunt. He fancied her eager eyes were filled with reproach, and he burst into a passion of regret.

"I might have known it would have killed you to see Isabel half dead in my arms; but I could not speak, for my heart was full. Oh, aunt, I love her! I love her!"

Isabel sank back, half fainting.

A ray of absolute joy shone in the old woman's eyes, and her brow became instantly calm and cool.

"I know it is madness, dear aunt. I was there, outside the window, that night she called me a clumsy lout, and declared she hated my very name; and yet, despicable wretch that I am, I love her!"

A look of great content crept into the eyes of Miss Moneypenny when she heard this old-fashioned burst of passion from John. She closed her eyes, and fearing to disturb her he remained quiet.

Isabel crept softly up the stairs, holding her hands tightly over her beating heart, and battling against the happiness that she felt surging within her.

"And my aunt dying, perhaps!" she murmured, indignantly. "Ungrateful wretch that I am!" Steadily keeping this thought before her, she succeeded in banishing the joy from her eyes, and when she joined John by her aunt's bedside she was as sorrowful almost as he.

All that night and the next day the old lady remained the same—motionless, seemingly lifeless, but for the vigor of the dying eyes, that seemed almost to speak in the intensity of their expression. Isabel, now fully recovered, watched with John, and one vied with the other in lavishing sad and sincere caresses upon the dearest friend they possessed upon earth until Friday evening, when the old lady died.

IV.

THE funeral was over, the will was read, and it was discovered that "Griselda Moneypenny, being in full possession of her faculties, and of sound and disposing mind," etc., etc., willed and devised every thing she possessed to her nephew, John Moneypenny, and her niece, Isabel Moneypenny, and their children, to the exclusion of that the said John and Isabel Moneypenny should become man and wife thirty days from the time of Griselda Moneypenny's decease; failing this, her property, personal and otherwise, was to be divided among a host of greedy relations, and as for Lascelles, he was requested to make his connection with her a profitable thing, she hoped he would do the same by her heirs." And there the will ended; not another word, one way or the other. So Isabel counted the days as they went by, as the Eastern gentleman did his beans, and in spite of the twinge of melancholy that shadowed her face, she became more and more beautiful every day. John scarcely could linger near her, and roamed about the grounds, gaunt and pale as a spectre. Isabel's persuasive tenderness he mistook for pity, and rejected her timid advances indignantly.

What was the poor girl to do? The days were passing, and soon he would be robbed of his inheritance. She would willingly have been dutiful and obedient to her aunt's desire; she would almost welcome it as a pleasure, so sacred did she consider these last requests; but John was so—so—stubborn; and here her rhetoric became sadly mixed up, and a tear or two fell upon her black dress, the first of a shower that rent her heart without consoling it. In the interest of all parties Lascelles, and one morning John Moneypenny, walking up and down the garden-path, heard the sweet voice of his cousin raised in remonstrance:

"It is quite impossible!" cried Isabel; "I am very unhappy, Mr. Lascelles. I beg of you to relieve me from my engagement. I can not marry you!"

"Of course you can't now!" said the shrill voice of De Vigny. "I don't expect such a thing, but you can not surely mean to throw me over altogether; why you can't be in earnest! Just think of it, Miss Moneypenny! A man madly in love with you. I worship the very ground you walk upon, and there isn't a girl for miles around that I'd look at such an offer."

"Then you are at liberty to throw your handkerchief to any of them," replied Isabel, "you couldn't be freer as far as I am concerned."

When John saw the slender form of the young landed proprietor retreating slowly toward the De Vigny by-path, he turned his steps homeward, and turning suddenly a corner of the balcony, found Isabel leaning on the step in such a pretty attitude of despondency that he could not, for his life, pass on.

"What is it, Isabel?" he said, seating himself by her side, and finding a tumultuous passion raging within him as he touched her little hand. "Why are you in tears?"

"I am so wretched and unhappy," sobbed Isabel. "I haven't a friend in the world!"

"Have you got any thing to say to me?" stammered John, not knowing exactly what he was saying.

"Why do you avoid me then?" continued Isabel.

John hesitated a moment—his lips trembled, and he grew pale. Then he cried, boldly,

"Because I love you!" dropping her hand and shrinking back a little from the rebuff he feared; "because I dare not be near you lest I should forget that you hate and despise me."

"But I don't, John; I love you dearly," said Isabel, lifting her head shyly, and raising two beseeching eyes to his; the tears lay upon her long lashes, and a sweet, almost infantile expression of joy shone in her face. John caught her in his arms, believing it all to be a deceitful, fallacious dream; but determining to enjoy it as long as possible, he did not speak for fear of awakening.

The house upon the hill at Scatterton is the cheeriest domain for miles around; and spending a few happy weeks there last fall, I determined to let the host of relatives (who consider themselves defrauded, and stigmatize my old friend John and his charming wife as mercenary wretches) know what a disinterested thing the marriage was, in spite of Aunt Moneypenny's Will.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

QUESTION IN ASTRONOMY.—People speak of the sun's breaking out. Will this account for the spots on its disk?

FAIR FRIEND.—As you are strong be merciful. Beat your carpets if you like, but don't hit 'em when they're down!

At school one day, when the lesson was the table of ratio and hear measure," a little boy, remarkable for the correct manner in which he usually said all his lessons, was quite unprepared.

"How is this, John?" said his teacher.

"I thought it was of no use, Sir," said John.

"No use!" interrupted the master.

"No, Sir; it's ale and beer measure," said John.

I answer it's ale and beer measure," said the master.

"Well, Sir," said the little boy, "father and I both think it is of no use to learn about ale and beer, as we mean never to buy, sell, or drink them."

SWEET CHILDREN.—Lavender kids.

I have a lingering love, I own,
For an old doctrine, held by some,
That woman's truest sphere is home;
Within the hallowed walls of home;
But when the babe alarmed the house
By railing headlong down the stair—
"Where's Mrs. Jones?" I cried to Ann,
With hands upraised in bleak despair.
"She's at the rink," replied the maid,
"A-ridin' the velocypedes!"

A resident of one of the suburban towns found the service at church very exciting, and full asleep. He was finally disturbed by the touch of a contribution-box in the hands of one of the deacons, who was taking up a collection; but, without opening his eyes, in a sleepy manner exclaimed "Season," and sank back to resume his nap. It is unnecessary to say that he was a season-ticket passenger on a railroad.

A countryman who had never paid more than twenty-five cents to see an exhibition went to view the "Forty Thieves." The ticket-seller charged him seventy-five cents for a ticket. Passing the pasteboard back he quietly remarked: "Keep it, mister, I don't want to see the other thirty-nine," and out he marched.

Recently a lady residing in Boston had occasion to correct her little girl, and was somewhat astonished and amused a few hours afterward, when putting her daughter to bed. After her usual prayer she added, "God bless good papa, and God bless nanania, and make her a good mamma."

MR. C——, of Boston, has justly a great reputation for wit. At a supper given after the success of "the Spirit of '76" the subject of play-writing came up. A conceited, would-be author remarked that in his opinion it was difficult to write a play. He himself would write one—a farce, that kind would take best, etc. There was somewhat of a smile of incredulity among his hearers.

"Oh, I mean it; you needn't laugh."

"I don't expect it," rejoined C——, good-naturedly.

Men of mark—chalk manufacturers. Men of check—the well-rounded. Men of conscience—those who don't say any thing about it. Men of parts—slaves. Men of consideration—those who are trying to shave others. Men of will—lawyers when indicting clients. Men of means—a great many mean ones. Men of interest—note-brokers, when figuring on the principal. Men who go it strong—those of weak minds.

"WHERE ARE MY SHIRTS?"—A certain Princess is now trying to obtain, in Paris, a separation from her lord and master on a most extraordinary ground. It appears that the Prince, on arriving, after two years' service in Mexico, telegraphed to the partner of his bosom no fond words of delight at coming back to his native shores, but simply the laconic and sorrowful query, "Where are my shirts? I can not find them!" Hence the application for a separation. Should the Princess succeed in obtaining one, her husband will, for the future, not only have to look after his shirts, but also to shift for himself in other matters as well!

A traveler in Pennsylvania asked the landlord if they had any cases of sun-strokes in that town. "No, Sir," said the landlord; "if a man gets drunk here we say he is drunk, and never call it by any other name."

Highly probable development of the "Hack" under Chinese management.

CUP PRESENTED TO JAMES GORDON BENNETT, JUN., OF HIS DEPARTURE FOR EUROPE IN THE YACHT "DAUNTLESS."

TESTIMONIAL CUP PRESENTED TO JAMES G. BENNETT, JUN.

We give above a representation of the cup presented lately to JAMES GORDON BENNETT, Jun., by his personal friends on the occasion of his departure for Europe in the yacht Dauntless. It was expected that MR. BENNETT would set sail on June 22; hence the inscription. He sailed on the 20th. MR. BENNETT is the Vice-Commodore of the New York Yacht Club, and has for years been at the head of those interested in yacht racing. His yacht Dauntless is considered the finest specimen of naval architecture yet produced in this country.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY.

CHAPTER XX.

But the saber sat remote from all,
A melancholy mute.

AZALEA's heart throbbed fast, and her lips whitened at the thought of her own design. Not that her nervousness checked her determination. She was one of those who carry a beautiful and serene courage in their hearts, which does successful war against the most timid terrors, the prescient alarms of a sensitive and vivid imagination. Ephemeral doubts and fears might flout through her mind as sea vapors steal round a rock's crest; but her purpose remained stanch and unshaken as the granite itself.

I feel much commiseration for my poor little heroine. She has genius and she has beauty. What more fatal provocatives to man's dislike and woman's hate could Nature have given her? Madame de Staël remarks somewhere that intellect for a woman is a magnificent morning robe. Faith that grows confused with much questioning; love that overreaches itself; hope that foresees its disappointment—such are the gourdons of intellect. Those whose minds are confined to peaceful levels, if they miss the glory of ascending the heights, at least evade the painful vibration of passing through the air, and the clouds of doubt that choke aspiring souls ere they reach the summit. Neither will her courage be a recommendation in the eyes of the superior sex. Men, as a rule, pity and love the creature that droops to them for protection; the woman who faints has the first claim to sympathy; the woman who shrieks is infinitely attractive: the woman who can accomplish a judicious combination of both is irresistible. I do not blame my brethren, for this sentiment of their originates in a natural and heroic vanity: they like to be called on to prove their own superiority—the superiority of muscle and form which Nature has given them—the superiority of mind to which educational training has assisted them. It is sweet and pleasant to protect a creature whom they love; and they can scarcely pardon an independence which dispenses with a parade of manly supremacy.

The Iphigenia that ran past the Auriel shrubberies was a portion of Church Lane, and so Azalea was not more than a mile from Arvel when she came in sight of the house which Sally had said was Mr. Douglas's. She walked up to the garden gate, and began to frame a few words of inquiry by which she might indnce Mr. Douglas to see her. Mr. Douglas, however, had little choice in the matter, for his door was wide open; and when Azalea stood on the threshold she saw an oldish man writing at a table, with his face partially averted from her. The only mode of introduction she dared to venture on was a small apologetic cough, Topsa walked on boldly and sniffed the stranger's legs with an air of suspicion, and Robert Douglas put down his pen and looked at the intruders.

Was it a fly tripping over his page, or a bird flopping against the pane—was it the old women tossing hats for orders, or the squire's son come to announce a holiday in place of a task? Something had disturbed him, and for an instant Douglas ascribed his sense of discomfort to some familiar petty cause. Then his glance fell on a fair-headed little girl, who might have been blown in with the sunbeam that streamed through his door, so noiseless had been her approach, so sunny was her aspect. He looked at her wonderingly.

"What do you want?" he said.

His tone was harsh, and Azalea pulled a rose-leaf to pieces between her fingers before she could find her voice.

"If you please, I want—" she began.

"Yes."

"I want—"

"Won't you sit down?" said Mr. Douglas suggested, pushing a chair toward her.

Azalea accepted the courtesy gratefully. She was not tired, but she was shaking with nervousness. Unfortunately the change of position did not bring increase of courage.

"Yes; what is it?" Mr. Douglas demanded once more. This time his tone softened, and he glanced at his open book. Azalea saw and interpreted the look aright. "He wants me to go," she thought, "and I shall not," she said any thing yet." In her perplexity and confusion she kicked her chair vigorously. Mr. Douglas searched under the table, and perceiving that the irritating noise was caused by her legs, he looked at them imploringly and said:

"Don't."

They stopped immediately, and Azalea muttered sullenly: "I want to learn something."

"Yes."

"I want to learn every thing," Azalea went on, in desperation. "I want to learn reading and drawing, arithmetic and French, and Latin, and Greek, and I want you to teach me."

"I do not teach girls," Mr. Douglas said, briefly.

"But I wouldn't be any more troublesome than a boy," Azalea pleaded. "I do want to get on so; for it breaks my father's heart, he says, to think that I am not to be taught like other children."

"What are they taught here excepting to hoe and to glean? and why does your father want me to be brought up differently from other children in your rank of life?"

"I don't know," Azalea said, simply, "excepting it is that I am different, you know."

Mr. Douglas, looking at the delicate feet and hands; the refined contour of the head, and the face bright and mutable with expression, resolved in himself that this child was very dissimilar from the red-cheeked, heavy-faced girls who shouted up the lane every Sunday from the door of church.

"Do you know any thing already?" he said.

"Not much," Azalea said, humbly.

He pushed a book toward her. "See if you can learn half a page while I write a letter to your father. Now, don't talk, but do what I tell you: if I find you to be intelligent, I may consent to help you; but another word, and I shall send you me." With which compliment to his absent pupils, Mr. Douglas bowed his head again over his book, checking with a gesture Azalea's effort to explain to him that she had got far beyond the first page of the Latin grammar, and that he was not testing her capabilities when he requested her to learn the primary rules. She repeated her task mechanically to herself to be quite certain of her perfect acquirement of it, and then she watched the shadows blowing along the hedgerow opposite the window, and wished she might follow the track of those dark spots, and see the little patches in the cherries in the garden, and then waved away past the corn-fields until they became thin, reckless specks in the distance of the distant hills. For a while the silence was unbroken in the little room. The dog lay curled up in the sun; the child sat motionless in the flickering light and shadow that played through the casement; and the man pondered over the mysteries of the human mind as he looked back on the months of strange generations who have left the Time to heritage each of their own follies, and strange characters traced on broken fragments of stone. Presently a few heavy drops splashed through the casement on the floor. These were succeeded by others, and a fresh scent of rain began to blow through the rose-trees at the window. Then a low patter of thunder rolled over the meadows, and a sharp vivid streak of pale fire played for an instant across the bosom of a black cloud. The dog crept under the table, the peals louder and fuller, until the lightning streaks and the thunderous volleys seemed to wave every living thing to silence. The birds ceased to sing, but fluttered uneasily round the fluffy nests, where their fledglings stared with bright curious eyes at the rain-drops pattering through their green roof of leaves. The kine herded together under the trees, while their less sedate companions, the horses, galloped wildly round the meadow at every fresh blast of the storm.

Azalea looked straight out on the angry confusion of the elements—the hurrying clouds streaked by quick flashes of fire; the sullen grandeur of the thunder crashing overhead in an ecstasy of wrath, and then rolling away into sullen murmurs over the echoing hills—all inspired her with a sort of awed delight.

"Are you not afraid of the storm?" Douglas asked, looking up from his work on the forests of Brazil, his eyes somewhat dazzled by the frequent-recurring flashes.

"Not now," Azalea answered; "I used to be when I was little, you know."

"That was a long while ago," Douglas suggested, amusedly. "And why were you afraid then?"

"I only used to be afraid when I had done any thing wrong—when I had stolen the best apples, and told daddy the wasps had eaten them, or lost the key of the store-room; then if a storm came it was dreadfully frightened, and thought God was speaking his anger to me through the clouds."

"And now?"

"Oh! now I don't do any thing wrong," she said, with audacious confidence. "I have all the apples I want, and there isn't a key to the storeroom."

"Can you do your lesson?"

"Yes."

"Then let us get it over," Douglas said, wearierly.

Azalea rendered up her grammar in a tremor of hope and fear—hope that she might attain her ends, and fear lest, by some treacherous failure of memory, she might blunder where she sought to be most certain of success.

Douglas was pleased and astonished at the exactness of the child's acquirements and at the lucidity of her understanding. He soon found that it was unnecessary to confine her attention only to the grammar. "To-morrow we will begin Virgil," he said, when the lesson was finished.

Azalea laughed in her heart, feeling that the victory was won, and that her father need suffer no further uneasiness concerning her education.

"Will you tell father call and see me?" Douglas began.

"He is a cripple, from paralysis," interrupted the girl, sadly.

She was surprised by the look of tender pity that beamed over the man's rugged features—a look so soft and plaintive that for an instant the harsh festures and deep-set eyes seemed wonderfully transformed by its beauty.

"I will come to-morrow," he said, briefly.

The light passed away from his eyes as he turned once more to his books, and Azalea thought she must have been mistaken in fancying that he looked almost handsome just now.

"I live just at Arvel," she said, pointing in the direction of the red gables that peered above a belt of woodland.

Douglas looked over the yellow, heaving fringe of the corn-fields, heavy-headed and stricken crossways by wet, and shivering in the wind—looked at the long line of the tangled hedgerows—at the purple flim of the far woodland, and the dim red house of Auriel towering behind it.

"I shall not forget," he said, musingly. "I should like to see Thurstan Mowbray's home. I hope I shall not be there alone," he added. "I do not care to meet more strangers than I can possibly avoid. Have you any friends?"

"I have none."

"I'm glad of it. Good-by. The rain has ceased, you see."

"Good-by," Azalea said, gayly; and tucking up her petticoats round her, she hurried away. Her fair hair blowing from her face, laughter shining in her eyes, and dimpling her soft, babylooking mouth, it was as if the spirit of beautiful youth had flitted into the old anchorite's gloomy cave, and had danced out again with the free wind and the sun, glad to turn its bright rays upon any object after the cold sorrow.

Douglas was relieved by her departure. Joy and loveliness were to him what the sight of children are to a barren wife.

CHAPTER XXI.

AN OASIS IN THE DESERT.

The next four years of her life were very sweet to Azalea. The sweetness was so still and subtle, the time slid so softly past her untrammeled heart that she herself hardly appreciated the rare worth and beauty of the vanishing hours. In after-years she grew wiser in her pain, and would wake from her slumbers with a strange pang of recollection stretching out her arms in the darkness of sorrow as if imploring Time to give back to her one breath of the old flowerscented sunshine—one glimpse of the old innocently careless face she had blessed her in these days. Then she longed with a passionate craving for the faint scent of the water-lilies that scarred the heritage of her youth, the ruttle of the ripened apples falling heavily though the pale leaves, with yellow wasps buzzing over the fallen prize for the last time, the whispered that whispered mysterious plaints through the dense woodlands—for her father's voice—for Topsa's sudden impetuative expressions of doggish will. All the dear trifles of her present content which passed unnoticed now, lived clearly in her mind in the cold hereafter, and she would no more clutch a remnant of the joys of her youth than the dead can leave darkness and corruption to dance with the village children in the green over their graves.

At present her happiness was crossed neither by regret nor prescience of trouble. Youth presses on blindly through its swift bright years, like the true lover who flew over the golden road that led to his mistress's bower without looking right or left. It is only those who have been already shipwrecked that tremble under the shadow of possible clouds, and shiver at the whisper of adverse winds.

George Moore was still feeble and helpless, but his willing inertion and sometimes broken speech seemed healthful compared to that old terrible time when his voice and limbs were numbed entirely by the dread gripe of paralysis. He was drifting toward the end, but so soft and gradual was the decay that he scarcely saw the deepening of the shadows. Life was fading from view as light dies away on the bosom of a still lake when the rosy dusk darkens slowly from warm indistinctness to impenetrable gloom.

Douglas's visits were a great solace to the old man. It had been arranged between them that the former should come to Auriel on those days when Azalea received her lessons. This arrangement was agreeable to Moore, who sat blinking with satisfaction, and mumbling inarticulate ejaculations on the girl's progress while she construed her Latin and carried such rustic intonation into her French exercises as nearly made her tutor swear with vexation. Douglas himself found it pleasant to quit for a while the low roof and plain whitewashed walls of his cottage for the old-fashioned grandeur of the Manor-grandeur infinitely lovelier to him from being tinged by the romance of decay and silence. He liked to wander through the long corridors and empty chambers when they were dushed by sunset. Then the mellow faces that gleamed in the dusky recesses had faint little tremblers of light moving round their cold, sweet faces, while in the picture-galleries the scarlet coats of the cavaliers glowed as if their breasts were once more facing the light of battle. Through the windows he looked on broken terraces, urns overturned in long grass, and a fountain where the nymphs arose that had once poised a bowl of translucent water was covered with green mould, while the dry cup contained only a few drops of rain, not more than sufficient to induce a passing swallow to drink its glossy breast for a brief instant against the worn, discolored edge. The old books collected by a learned ancestor of the Mowbrays were linked together with cobwebs, save where Douglas's hand moved them asunder. The collection was a rich and varied one, but no work studied later than the period when George the Second was king; for the last learned and wealthy member of the Mowbray family had died about that period, and his successor, more intent on renping than sowing the grain on his estate, added not a single volume to his libraries, nor a tree to his park. Rare early specimens of the literature of all countries stood in dusky rows on the shelves, and Douglas felt pleasure almost akin to enthusiasm during the quiet silent hours he spent in examining their contents. Sometimes Topsa would wander in with his nose up, as if he smelt rats in the air. Sometimes his little mistress came and crouched in a sunny corner, deep in the perusal of some romance borrowed from the shelves of her own sitting-room, where some frivolous female scion of the Mowbrays had left a series of the Waverley novels, Thaddeus of Warsaw, and other levities of her era. When thus occupied Azalea was as quiet as the statue of the sleeping Psyche in the niche behind her. She grew at length to be a part of those still summer noons in Douglas's mind, and the merry pierced the silence by a harsh tone or a sudden gesture.

She is really tolerable," was the first concession Douglas made in her favor; "and if her French accent was not so vile would be a pleasant pupil." He said this to Moore, who, not hearing his remark, took upon himself the writing for granted, and, nodding his head, muttered, "Yes, it is beautiful!"

"Perhaps you were a little boy you didn't know much," Azalea retorted. "French don't come by nature."

But his tone, if harsh, was salutary. The French soon progressed more fluently.

"As to the dead languages," Douglas said, sadly, "I will teach the parson's boys were like her. If she goes on like this she will be a good double-first spoiled."

Unconsciously to himself he began to feel the day grow brighter toward the hour of his visit to Auriel. It was something for this desolate man to know that there were yet two faces in the world that gladdened at his approach. By degrees the dim old house began to look less home to him as he neared them in his daily walks. The by-path across the fields that led from the distant village to Auriel had been so little frequented that the corn grew thickly up to the very verge of the ditches, and mixed with the long trailing branches of the blackberry. And the autumn noons Douglas lingered to watch the butterflies flit over the golden floats of wheat—to hear the dull, sad tone of the reaping-hook fall vibrate through the dreamy silence, until the last echo died away over the gleaming fringes of fair-field. And the tone of those reaping-hooks was sweet under his tread; the fragile hedge-blossoms fluttered away from their stems as he brushed past them; familiar sounds and sights—the mole-hills, spoke in the hum of insects, the murmurous coo of wood-doves, the stir of the bearded corn, as it bowed to the soft breath of the summer wind.

As he paused to enjoy the mellow richness of earth's ripest, sweetest hours he felt something that was of these blooming solitudes enter into his heart—something which, if not content, was at least peace.

The peerless, blossom-dropping summer was succeeded by snow and frost. Douglas did not notice the change, but drew ditcher and stiffened briers, but pressed on quickly to Auriel. There was yet summer in his heart when he saw old Moore's face pleasure as his approach, and observed Azalea's eager face smiling welcome on him through the congealed panes as he came down the path.

Four years passed away noiselessly to these three oddly-assorted companions; outside their lives the great world was rushing along in its mighty stream of noisy joy and shrill pain. The cities were filled with feasting and dancing, with rumors of war, and prattle of fashions. Great political changes altered the face of established laws; national sorrow and national triumph made sore or glad the hearts of multitudes; but the echoes of the world's sympathies did not penetrate to Auriel. Azalea learned to speak pure English and tolerable French. She grew attached to her tutor, and with feminine tact she dishher little best to lighten the cloud on his life. He was not happy, she was sure of that: for, although he rarely spoke harshly now, or frowned at her as he did on the day they first met, still he never sang at the old—never played with her, at the predatory antics of the magpie or the blithe gambols of the kitten.

It was not that Douglas made any affectation of melancholy; but he was like a prisoner whose arm has been healed for so long they know not what use to make of freedom. He is not easy for a man of forty-five, crushed in spirit, and embittered by a single failure, to lift up his voice in the little aimless songs of joy that bubble up on youth's lips. He could direct Azalea's studies, and sympathize with her earnest enthusiasm when directed toward the acquisition of knowledge; but he found it hard to restrain his impatience when the girl would suddenly quote the Euripides and fling Sophocles to the ground, in her impetuous pursuit of Topaz, as the latter disappeared, in a sweep of doggish agitation, to make vindictive war on the kitten.

Meanwhile old Moore was slowly dying, and they saw it not; neither did they see that Azalea was growing into a beautiful young woman. At the end of four years, when she was seventeen, Lord Orme and his family returned to the country to open up their permanent residence in England, as the health of the Hon. Rosa Orme was now thoroughly re-established.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE ORMES AGAIN.

I HAVE spoken before of Lord Orme's house in Brighton. I have now to introduce you to the old baronial residence of the Ormes, which was also situated in Sussex; but it stood far away from the gay glare of the town, on a wild-looking range of downs. From the upper windows you could detect a gleam of sea shining beyond the furthest flush of hills; but except this, and the thread that made so many glittering links down the shadowed valleys, there was little else to break the flowing monotony of the view.

When the Ormes was unoccupied by the family the sheep would crowd up round the walls, and poke their innocent noses against the nailstudded doors; there was no fence-work to separate the front part of the house from the downs —no trees to cast flickered shadows down the sides of the ivy towers. In long, sunny days the massive pile breasted hot suns and rushing winds, and beyond the rude magnificence of its proportions there was little to admire in the exterior of Orme Castle.

"A melancholy place," the Misses Orme pronounced the home of their forefathers to be.

"Reminded her of pirates," Miss Slater averred, with a perfected shiver.

Upon which Conrad punished her by asking her if she would not like to become "the windy bride of a corsair?" which remarkable bit of invitation he had discovered in an old drama of Lord Thurlow's.

Conrad's holidays had not begun when the Ormes returned from abroad.

"Thank Heaven for that!" Miss Slater said, fervently; as a relief to the poor governess when the fly was to fo. When she read morning prayers, and prayed for health and happiness for all the members of the household, she could not help glaring evilly at that terrible boy, whose curly head, looking like the crest of a pert cockatoo, bobbed constantly up and down, keeping time with her somewhat singsong intonation; "And look kindly on our evil doings," she chanted, looking fixedly at a most obnoxious curve movement in the could not herself yield the forgiveness she petitioned for.

It was on an evening in October when the family returned home; after the bustle of arrival had subsided, the inmates wandered helplessly about the house like strange cats that are not sufficiently at home to clean their feet and go through all the licking and purrings incidental to catlish toilets.

The luggage had not arrived, so the ladies' hands could not commence their work. The house looked desolate and strange; no familiar occupations were about with which the girls could occupy themselves. Lord Orme wished to write some letters, but his inkstands were serving as cemeteries for deceased flies, and his pens and paper were locked up in his dispatch-box.

Miss Slater longed for tea; but the female demesnes had only just obtained some for themselves, and utterly declined to pay any attention to the angry vibrations of the bells until their own requirements were satisfied.

After dinner the girls strolled out on the sloping lawn at the back of the house, and there held council over their plans for the future. Miss Slater sat down in the drawing-room and looked sentimentally at Lord Orme, and Lord Orme went to sleep.

Rosa and Amelia had improved in appearance since the old days, when they walked like long-lair automata under the presiding jerks of Miss Slater's hand.

Rosa was black-eyed and tall: she had one of those figures over which milliners rejoice—nice and straight, no trouble at all to fit. Her dressmaker and her lady friends called her "so very distinguished-looking." I have observed that when a young lady, wealthy and high-born, lacks the feminine loveliness to which her rank and other advantages justly entitle her, the female jackals of her court generally disarm criticism by the emphasis with which they proclaim her to be "distinguished;" that is, supposing the object of their admiration is sufficiently large and lanky-looking to merit the appellation; if she be short and fat they are reduced to the suggestion that she is "so sweet."

Amelia Orme would have come into the latter category. She was rather below the middle height, had a turned-up nose, a merry little dad and throat; her eyes were hazel, and were ordinarily placid in expression; but when she was angered a wicked spark would flash suddenly in their sullen depths. She was full and thick in figure; her hair was a burnished brown, and she had a great quantity of it.

Amelia was sullen and phlegmatic. Rosa was lively and imitative. When the two sisters quarrelled Rosa had the advantage at once at the commencement of the warfare, but ultimately the victory remained with Amelia. Rosa exhausted her rage in angry exclamations, withering sarcasm, and quick, hot tears; on these occasions her eyes danced, her voice shook, and her nose got red.

Amelia stiffened into the most impenetrable stubbornness; her face was calm as an Egyptian idol's, and heavy in its anger like a storm-laden cloud. In many respects she was amiable. She loved Rosa more than herself. She never gratuitously irritated Miss Slater, and she was solemnly respectful to her father.

But of the two girls Rosa was while he preferred Rosa, who was waspish and impertinent. In her most agreeable moods Amelia was monotonous, and she was so unconscious of her necessity for sympathy as a stone-wall is to the electric flash that plays over it in times of storm.

The sisters looked almost guilty as they stood together in the soft gloom of this autumn evening, attired in flowing white dresses, and with Roman ornaments twined in their ringlets. Around them was a bold expanse of grass downs flushed by sunset. A fresh sea wind blew over the high peaks, and all the land was prepared to secure. It was to be their first appearance in society as grown-up ladies; and their own expectations of the result were somewhat extravagant.

"Do you think the Marquis of Grandchers will propose for me that night?" sharp-eyed Rosa said, alluding to an unmarried country magnate.

"Not that night, dear," Amelia replied, slowly. "Perhaps he'll do it when he calls next day. For my part, I shouldn't think of marrying a man who had not a handsome face, and don't so much care for landed estates; there are often so many mortgages round the corner."

Then they discussed the fashion and class of people who were to receive invitations.

"I suppose we must ask that Lady Diana," Rosa said, viciously. "I'm sure she has no business to admire in a woman of her age I can not imagine."

"She is two or three and thirty, isn't she?" yawned Amelia.

"Forty, if she's a day," the other answered, emphatically; and Amelia, who was acute enough in some respects, wondered what admirer of Rosa's had offended from her. Lord Orme's late attractions of that "splendid mirage," as a clever Frenchman once designated Lady Diana Merton.

"My dears," called Lord Orme from the drawing-room window, "come in; you will take cold."

Lord Orme had a vague theory that every one who went out of doors after dinner must necessarily catch cold. He always remained indoors all the long mellow summer evenings. He called the dew damp, and preferred listening to the thrush through closed windows and drawn curtains.

The Misses Orme obeyed the summons, and shortly afterward entered the drawing-room, all fatigued, and retired to their bedchamber. Rosa went to bed first, and was just dropping off to sleep when the happened to glance toward Amelia, who was sitting by the mirror, her hands moving rapidly through her hair, and holding some mysterious instrument, which, from a distance, resembled meat-skewers. In a moment Rosa was wide awake. Her black eyes looked suspiciously at her sister's proceedings, and she murmured, with emphasis, "Crimps!" Then she sat up in the bed, and stared at Amelia.

"Why are you crimping?" she asked, severely.

Both sisters wore their hair frizzled over the eyes, in the disheveled Bacchante-like style with which our fashionable young ladies delight to startle smooth brows of youth. As a rule, in the privacy of home-life, the Misses Orme's waving locks were allowed to remain in their natural state of flatness. The hair resented constant torture, and if twisted too often and too much, under the fervent pressure of the hot iron so as to come out in handfuls. There were various degrees of frizziness according as the occasion demanded. If a decidedly marked one to be fascinated, the lady's-maid, under Miss Slater's directions, wrought her young mistress's tresses into a state of marvelous confusion; if only a commoner, with barren prospects, was to be encountered, the governess disdained to assist at her charges' toilets, and merely a gentle wave redeemed the hair from its ordinary imprisonment. Of any state of frizziness, Miss Slater was certain to wave to a certain extent; but when the girls believed themselves to be secured against intruders, they rejoiced to escape the nightly irritation of feeling hard-twisted knobs intervene between their heads and the pillow.

"Whom do you expect to see to-morrow?" Rosa said, with increased severity. And Amelia, looking very conscious, dropped the braid she was manœuvring, and muttered—

"I heard papa say that if he went into Brighton to-morrow, and found that the — Dragoons had arrived, he should call on Captain Mowbray and some of the other officers to dinner."

The trembling stood revealed now the mystery for the frizzlers of the night.

"And you would have let me go to sleep without telling me!" Rosa cried, in an accent of deep reproach.

"The maid has gone to bed with a fucenche," Amelia answered, indolent; "so she couldn't do it for you, and it's only a chance, you know."

"It must be a good chance for which you would care to take any trouble," Rosa responded, spitefully. She jumped out of bed, and sat down before her mirror with a look of determination in her little sharp face. As she was far more energetic and active than her sister she was avenged by producing a more brilliant result.

But on the morrow they found that their labor had been wasted; for when Lord Orme came back from Brighton he and accompanied his daughters waiting for him at the porch, whither they had flown to meet him in an unusual access of filial affection, he told them that the Dragoons had not yet arrived. They were expected to leave Norwich to-morrow, and as they were going to remain for a few days only in London, they could not arrive at Brighton for some days yet.

"Captain Mowbray's home is in Essex, is it not, papa?" asked Rosa.

"Yes; but of course I suppose he has ever seen it since he was a child," Lord Orme answered.

"It is about as valuable a house to him as an old year's nest would be to a bird in the spring."

"Why does he not let it?" asked the practical Amelia.

"They will never let it," Lord Orme said, decisively. "They are as proud as Spaniards, and as impecunious. In the court-yards of the Estarial at Madrid you may sprinkle grain enough to feed a team of mules; but I imagine that if a heretic hand wished to remove the signs of neglect and misery it would be refused with fury.

"Let it be; our grass is better than your hay.' I no doubt the Mowbrays think the Auriel owls are worthier occupants of their chimneys than the smoke from a stranger's fire."

"I AGREE!" exclaimed Rosa, with a flash of recollection, "that is the name of the place that funny little girl came from. Do you remember her, Amelia? A most disagreeable creature papa brought to Brighton just before we went abroad."

"I remember her," Amelia answered, shortly.

"She was horrid."

"She must be quite a woman now: I wonder what she is like?" Rosa mused.

"Worse than ever, I should think," the other said, decisively. "At what time do we dine, papa?"

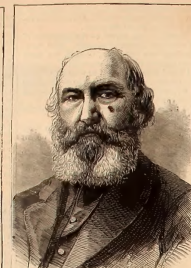
"Not for the next two hours. I wish you would come and read me the Times, Amelia; I shall not close my eyes to-night if I do not know what they are about; and I have such a pain in my eyes I can not read them myself."

Amelia looked pleased; it was her way of expressing disapprobation of any proposal that did not please her. Amelia's depression was as much an affair of the leather-bound and gilt as of "cloudy." Lord Orme turned from her with impatience.

"I read them, papa!" cried the shrill voice of Rosa. Her father thanked her, doubtfully, he could not well decline the proffer; but as he anticipated, Rosa read with increasing half a dozen lines, and was asleep.

Amelia looked contemptuously at

JULIUS EICHBERG.—[PHOT. BY FOSS, BOSTON.]



MATHIAS KELLER.—[PHOT. BY FOSS, BOSTON.]

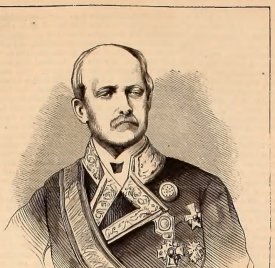
LAST OF THE PEACE JUBILEE.

PROMINENT in their connection with the Boston Peace Jubilee, as coadjutors of Mr. P. S. GILMORE, as orchestral leaders, and as musical composers, were Mr. JULIUS EICHBERG and Mr. MATHIAS KELLER. The latter is well known as the composer of the "American Hymn," which was sung during the first day of the Jubilee.

A sketch of Mr. KELLER, published two years ago in a musical paper, says of him: "Forming an idea of Mr. KELLER from his many beautiful and popular melodies, one would naturally suppose him to be a young-hearted, gray-headed, good-natured, enthusiastic, American-ized German; and so in very truth is he. Being almost the only representative in this country of that peculiar German style in song, so tender and graceful, yet classic withal, which has already made ABT and RUCKEN so favorably known, Mr. KELLER'S songs have not yet extended to that outer circle of popularity where the hand-organs claim them as their own; but among the lovers of German song—and they are many—they have never failed in obtaining the appreciation and recognition so well deserved. It is now twenty-one years since Mr. KELLER abandoned his own father-land for ours, and during all that time he has zealously endeavored to amalgamate the American and German elements in his compositions, but, try as he will, the latter still predominates; and even his latest songs, though written to New England words, might easily pass as of foreign birth." Mr. KELLER was born at Ulm, in the Kingdom of Würtemberg, March 20, 1813, and came to America in 1846. He studied music under LEINDPAINTER and Molique at Stuttgart, and the celebrated RITTER VON SEYFRIED at Vienna. For seven years he was band-master in the Third Royal Brigade. After coming to this country he became an orchestral leader in Philadelphia, and conducted both English and German opera in that city successfully. Shortly after the breaking out of the war a prize of five hundred dollars was offered by a committee of gentlemen for the best national hymn. Here was an opportunity for our German-American. His love of liberty had grown with his growth since his arrival in his chosen land, and at this time his patriotism knew no bounds; so it was but natural that he should have felt himself called upon to compete for the prize, or, what was far more precious to him, the honor of having written the Hymn of the American nation. Thus it was that the American Hymn had its birth.

Mr. JULIUS EICHBERG was born in the year 1825, and manifested in early life such remarkable musical talent that, through MENDELSSOHN'S recommendation, he was admitted to the Conservatory at Brussels, where, in 1845, he obtained the first prizes in violin and composition. He held afterward the position of musical director in several of the most prominent German opera-houses. His later years, previous to coming to this country, were spent in Geneva, Switzerland, where he officiated as Director of Sacred Music, under appointment of the Consistory of the Church of Geneva. He came to this country in 1856, and has since been living in Boston most of the time, where he has founded the Boston Conservatory of Music, now generally considered the leading Boston music school. Mr. EICHBERG has been very successful as a composer of comic operas, and may safely claim the title of the first American operatic composer. His operas, "The Doctor of Alcantara," "A Night in Rome," and the "Rose of Tyrol," have been successfully performed in all the great American cities, and seem to be as far removed from OFFENBACH'S buffoonery as from the pretentiousness of the modern German school.

Mr. EICHBERG is also the head teacher of music in the Boston High School, and was last year sent by the city to Europe on a mission to inspect and report every thing connected with musical education in the German schools.



FRANCISCO SERRANO, REGENT OF SPAIN.

FRANCISCO SERRANO, REGENT OF SPAIN.

FRANCISCO SERRANO, one of the prominent leaders of the late Spanish Revolution, and who at its close became the head of the Provisional Government, has been, by the Cortes, made Regent of Spain. He is a man of over threescore and ten years. He fought in the war of Spanish Independence, and there acquired his early military education. He was opposed to ESPARTERO, and in 1843 contributed to the overthrow of his administration. His influence over the mind of Queen ISABELLA, shortly after her marriage with the DUKE OF CADIZ, occasioned some serious difference between himself and the King-Consort. After the fall of M. DE SALAMANCA he became a Liberal; was exiled in 1854; but soon returned to Spain, and supported with considerable ardor the O'DONNELL and ESPARTERO administration. When these two entered into conflict he sided with O'DONNELL, and was by the latter created DUKE DE LA TORRE in 1856. Ever since 1865, when he was made Captain-General of Madrid, he has acted with the party of progress. It is to this party that he owes his present position as Regent of Spain.

The establishment of the Regency in Spain seems to be a kind of compromise entered into between the Monarchists and Republicans. The influence of the latter faction, while it is feeble in the Cortes, is so strong among the people that it was not safe to disregard it. Thus the Provisional Government yields to the Regency, and Spain still waits for her king.

MINOT'S LEDGE LIGHT-HOUSE, OFF BOSTON HARBOR.—DRAWN BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 445.]

THE PATENT-OFFICE.

THE Patent-Office, Washington, D. C., was established in 1790. The old office was destroyed December, 1836, by fire, together with all the records, files, models, designs, and documents. Many of these lost records were restored through the exertions of patentees. Since 1836 from the new office there have issued 85,000 patents, and about 75,000 models of patents are to be found in the saloons of the office, and are open to inspection. During the years just following upon the fire a small space sufficed for the uses of the Patent-Office; but now the saloons occupying the upper story of the building are required for models; the draughtsman occupies two large rooms; the library two more; and the files of the patents two more, and will require another soon. Twenty examiners, with forty assistants, are now required to perform the duties formerly attended to by one man. About 320 persons altogether are employed in the office. The receipts are about $700,000 per annum, and far more than cover the expenses of this important department. The number of applications for patents last year was 20,000; of patents issued, 14,000; of caveats, 3800. Our illustration shows the interior of the room containing the plans of patents.

The Commissioner of Patents makes a yearly report to the Secretary of the Interior, which, with its accompanying documents, is published at the public expense.

PATENT-OFFICE, WASHINGTON, D. C.—EXAMINERS AT WORK.—[SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.]

MINOT'S LEDGE LIGHT-HOUSE.

WE give on page 444 a representation of the Minot's Ledge Light-house, near Cohasset. It is a dangerous locality to vessels making Boston harbor in an easterly storm. The ledge was named after one of the early settlers. The light-houses and light-ships placed there have been successively washed away, before the present structure was built. The last one, destroyed April 16, 1851, was built of iron. It was then determined to build one of stone, like the famous Eddystone Light-house, on the English coast. The work was placed in charge of Captain, now General, ALEXANDER—a distinguished officer in the United States Engineer Department.

The entire masonry, which up to a certain height from the water is a solid mass of stone, was fitted and put together at the yard of the constructor, and then freighted out to the ledge for permanent erection, a matter of no slight difficulty, when it is remembered that the men had to work up to their arm-pits in the water, and scarcely more than a hundred working hours could be secured in a year, the workmen being constantly lifted off their feet by incoming waves and afterward having to be replaced by the boats in attendance. But it was completed, and stands an enduring monument of engineering skill. A more lonely habitation could hardly be imagined, and yet before it was built there were a thousand applicants on the books for the office of light-keeper, of whom two are constantly on duty in the house.

The light-house is a mile and a half from the nearest land, and at low-water the highest part of the rock is bare. The diameter, and the whole height of the stone-work is 88 feet. It took two years (1855–1857) to level the foundation bed. Only four stones were laid in 1857.

JUST IN TIME TO BE TOO LATE—A DAILY SCENE AT ANY OF OUR FERRIES.—[DRAWN BY THOMAS WORTH.]

THE SUMMIT OF MOUNT WASHINGTON.

MOUNT WASHINGTON is the highest mountain in New England, rising 6285 feet above the level of the sea. It is one of the eastern group of the White Mountains. Our illustration, on page 441, represents the summit of this peak, and is a picturesque representation of the scene which it portrays. As one ascends the mountain vegetation gradually disappears. Soon only dwarf pines are visible; at last even these disappear, and the only indication of vegetable life is the lichen; upon the top of the mountain the rocks lie absolutely naked to the sky, as shown in our picture.

ANCIENT MAGIC.

MEDICINAL plants and herbs were in as much request among the sorcerers of antiquity as they are at this day among the pagans of Asia and Africa. We never has not read Monte Cristo and have but a feeble idea of the bright elysium into which a preparation of the Egyptian hemp can transport its votaries. Anciently the pagan priests of Syria would subject the senses of temple visitors to ecstatic visions, furnished by the fumes of opium, and by presenting to their sight pictures or groups artistically disposed would give their thoughts and aspirations whatever direction they found best. There is every probability that they performed mesmeric operations on them. There are very few precedents in profane history more full of fun and drollery than those in My Daughter Elinor.

A NOVEL.

8vo, PAPER, $1 25.

From the N. Y. Evening Post.

A good American novel, presenting life and society in the United States—the life that we live and the society of which we are a constituent part—has long been the desideratum of publishers and all the people of novel-readers. * * A story in which the characters are types of the American people at large, differing from the same social representatives of other countries, is surely issued from the press. Such a story is "My Daughter Elinor," which is destined to attain a high popularity, because delineating with naturalness and verisimilitude the life that is around us. If, from such books that the historian gathers the backbindes of the age of which he writes. In Mr. Grey we have the portraiture of the accomplished politician; in "My Daughter Elinor" we have a real woman of flesh and blood, such as many a reader has made love to in the days of premiere jeunesse. The style is exceedingly unaffected, at times straining overmuch at epigram, and again running a little into slipshod; and the dialogue is rapid and natural, and at times strong with obvious comment or testing with inevitable inference. Mrs. Hazlett is a charming delightful Mrs. Malaprop, and Tad Tilman is an original drawn from nature. The reader must keep his eye out of "My Daughter Elinor" from the novel itself. The authorship is kept from the public, and we know nothing, however, in saying that the success of the book will not reveal the secret.

From the N. Y. Herald.

A work for above the general order of American novels. * * The characters in "My Daughter Elinor" are drawn and vigorous, the dialogues are animated and interesting, the descriptions natural, but not over two exceptions, admirably drawn. The author, whoever he is, displays a marked ability for novel writing.

The Hartford Daily Courant.

The Messrs. Harper are doing a great deal of good reading just now, "dog-cheap"—at less than cost in fact. We have perused all the novels of CHARLES READE at ridiculously low prices, and now they are doing the same with THACKERAY'S works. * * * "Vanity Fair" is cheaper by far than any book of the same size, weight, and quality of material could be sold at before the war, though paper was so much cheaper then than now. It is far below the actual manufacturing cost. * * * We like to see every thing, books especially, cheap, and we like to see cheap reading, and at the smallest profit.

AMERICAN AND ENGLISH NEUTRALITY.

THE London Star, the paper of the most radical American sympathies in England, says that America stands in relation to Cuba exactly as England did in relation to the Southern Confederacy; and it insists that the departure of an armed expedition from New York against Spain is as flagrant a violation of the neutrality laws of the United States as the sailing of the Alabama from Liverpool against those of Great Britain. But the Star forgets that the United States authorities moved upon the first intimation of the Spanish representatives, and that their vigilance has been unrelaxing ever since. The British Government, on the contrary, was deaf to the most urgent warnings and requests of our Minister until it was too late—deaf in such a way that, under the circumstances, the theory of bad faith was instantly adopted by the public mind of this country as the explanation. But the Spanish Minister is satisfied with the conduct of the officers of the United States at this port; and public opinion in Spain will not accuse of duplicity the Government whose officers are so efficient.

Nor ought the Star to forget any English friend of America to forget that the general attitude of the two Governments, under similar circumstances, is entirely different. The British Government conceded belligerent rights to the rebels in this country before a battle had been fought —and, unless we are much mistaken, before it could have heard of the proclamation declaring a blockade of the Southern ports. This haste to recognize as a belligerent a party which was up to that moment merely insurrectionary, with the consequent relief from circumstances so fully recited in the correspondence of Mr. SEWARD and Mr. ADAMS, and the vehement hostility of the press, showed an unfriendly spirit which is an essential element of ill-will in consideration of the subject. But the case of the United States and Cuba is wholly different. Public sympathy is unbounded in this State as an island striking for independence of a harsh, foreign rule; and there is very little doubt that the President and many of his Cabinet share this abstract sympathy for the revolution. Nevertheless, the Government has not yet conceded belligerent rights to the Cubans, although the struggle has lasted eight months, and the conduct of its officers at this port, which is the base of the operations of Cuban sympathy, is heartily approved, as we have stated, by the Spanish representatives. The correctness of the two cases are thus, as the Star will see, materially different.

If, indeed, the Star can find any proof of the collusion of this Government with the insurgents in Cuba—if it can show that the sympathy of the President and of the Cabinet, and the natural good-wishes of the American people for every other people struggling for independence and popular government, lead to open acquiescence in flagrant defiance of the law and the authority of the United States, by such persons as usually compose a filibustering expedition—if, in a word, the Star can prove that the Governments of the United States in consulting the British Government for lack of zeal in enforcing its neutrality laws, while it is convincing at the evasion of its own, then, we admit, the Star will justly contrast the treatment of conduct which would destroy all the moral force of its position upon the English question.

That the cause of Cuba may be noble and praiseworthy while that of the rebels was unspeakably mean and inhuman does not affect the question. The mere neutrality law is not to be enforced against countries that we dislike and to be evaded in favor of those that we like. If we think that the cause of Cuba is so just that we ought to favor it, there is a way to do so without meanness or skulking. In that case let us frankly recognize Cuban independence and treat with what is called the Cuban Republic, and tell Spain that we take all the risk.

Then England can not complain of our neutrality conduct, for we should have become a party prepared for all the consequences. But until we are ready to take that position there is but one other course that we can honorably pursue, and that is the policy of our laws vigorously. If we mean to treat such gentlemen as Captain RYAN and his two or three hundred recruits of various nationalities—artificial devotees of liberty and equal rights as of course they must be—as friends of humanity and justice and good order, let us frankly say so, and abandon the attempt to stop their departure. But if they are to be regarded as defying the law, let the authority of the Government continue to be asserted as it is by its officers at this port; and to make our position unmistakable to the world, let the Government, as in the days of WASHINGTON, and even of FOOX and FILLMORE, issue its proclamation of warning.

Thus far, indeed, with the exception of such a proclamation, the conduct of the officers of the Government in regard to Cuba has maintained the ancient renown of the United States. The authorities have executed the laws—laws made not for oppression, like the Fugitive Slave Law, but for the general welfare, and to prevent one war being the occasion of a general struggle. Meanwhile if the prompt execution of the laws seriously threaten liberty or good order, the Government has the discretion of making their enforcement unnecessary by taking part with threatened liberty. It can not, even if it wished, carry water upon both shoulders. It can not with one hand menace England for doing what the other hand is doing to Spain. Let the Star watch as closely as it can; and we say again that it can establish this Government's dishonorable conduct in the Cuban question, it will have gone far to destroy the moral force of the Alabama claims. But we warn it that it will have its labor for its pains.

NEW ISSUES.

In the unprecedented political calm which has fallen upon the country it is only natural that issues should present themselves of a different kind from those that have engaged the public mind during a generation. And it is upon this situation that the Democratic party founds its hope of returning to partial power. For the new issues arise, of course, in the Republican party, which is composed of the party of independent and progressive men, and of those who are inspired by other purposes than the possession of the spoils merely. The Temperance movement now is not supported by the Democratic party. The Temperance movement, for the same reason, is not supported by it, and will never be. The reason is not that the Democratic party holds that government has nothing to do with such questions, as some Democrats, and many who are not Democrats, honestly believe, but because the great body of the ignorant voters belong to that party, and the party policy must be shaped accordingly; and equal justice to temperance are not agreeable to ignorant minds.

The new issues, therefore, will spring from the Republican party, and the first one, apparently, is to that party's platform. A National Temperance Convention, with political objects, is to meet at Chicago on the 1st of September. A Temperance Union will presently assemble at Syracuse, in this State. The Maine Temperance Convention has lately met, almost unanimously laid upon the table the temperance resolutions of the Republican Convention, and nominated a temperance candidate for Governor. In Massachusetts it is announced that the election will turn mainly upon the liquor issue. If Governor CLAFLIN should prefer to go to Congress, it is supposed that Mr. GEORGE B. LORING, a positive prohibitionist, will be accepted by the Republican party, to avoid a schism upon the question, while the freedom of whisky will be represented by Mr. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

It would certainly seem to be very possible that in so languid a political year a vigorous campaign of the Temperance men, who must be drawn almost entirely from the Republicans, would offer the Democratic party in Maine a better chance of success than it has known for many years; while the nomination of Mr. LORING upon a prohibitory platform in Massachusetts would for many reasons make the vote for Mr. ADAMS much more respectable than his former vote. The question in all Democratic opposed to the war, we believe, until the second year; a friend and ally of General BUTLER, who is representative of the Democratic party, is a candidate agreeable to those who are not BUTLER Republicans, and who prefer the older confessors of the faith. The Senatorial election in Ohio, over which Mr. WILSON will occur during the session of the next Legislature; and should a decided majority of the members prove to be of a political complexion to favor his claim to be a candidate for Mr. WILSON'S seat, will undoubtedly appear with excellent effect as a more teetotal teetotaler than the late lamented Father MATHEW.

No one who has watched closely since the end of the war can be surprised by the prominence which Temperance questions have assumed in the public mind of this country. The progress of intemperance is such as to challenge the most thoughtful inquiry as to the best method of arresting it. The Temperance politicians rest their cause upon experience and public order. They point to statistics and humanity. They appeal to the tax levy and to domestic peace. Their argument is powerful and persuasive. The right and propriety of licence are, they contend, entirely conceded; but the principle of license or regulation involves prohibition; and the degree of the restraint is merely a question of expediency to be decided upon careful consideration. The rejoinder is that sumptuary laws of every kind always fail, and that the reform sought by the Temperance party must be achieved by moral suasion; that if government may decree what we shall sell and eat and drink, it becomes the most intolerable of despotisms, because in the nature of things there can be no guarantee that its prohibitions will be always, or indeed often, wise; that beginning with prohibiting beer and wine and spirits, it will proceed to prohibit coffee and tea; and that there will be no security for rocking-chairs and feather-beds; that it reverses the order of civilization by tending to sacrifice the individual to the State, and increases instead of lessening the functions of government.

But to these arguments the practical experience of communities in which there has been a trial of the two systems will furnish a conclusive answer. If it has been found, for instance, in Massachusetts, during the rule of the most stringent law, that the grog-shops were reduced, that the good order of villages was palpably improved, that the character of the public interest was heightened, that hundreds of young men were saved by the practical difficulties of gratifying the appetite for liquor, and hundreds of homes restored, for the same reason, to cheerfulness and peace, these facts will be mighty allies of the new issue, and perilous adversaries to the theory of the limitation of government.

But there are other considerations which should be carefully weighed by every Republican who is urged to vote exclusively upon this issue. To divide the party is to bring the Democrats into power. To the exigency such time as the public welfare, including the interest of Temperance, will be more benefited by the ascendency of that party? The platform of the Maine Republicans declares "that we emphatically renew our adhesion to the principles of prohibition and a vigorous enforcement of laws to that end." Ought a Temperance man, under the circumstances, to abandon a party which takes such a position, and thereby help to give the victory to one that denounces all such laws? Could an honest friend of the Liberty party in New York twenty-three years ago have consistently refused to support the Whig or the Democratic party if either of them had expressed themselves in corresponding terms upon the Slavery question? As it was, it was evidently doubtful whether Liberty would gain by the success of either party; but can the same be said of the Temperance movement now?

OUR SUPPLY OF WATER.

DOUBT having been expressed as to the capacity of the Croton Valley to supply our future population with water, the question is an interesting one whether it is well founded, and what means are required to secure the city against such a contingency. It may be necessary to imitate the example of Boston, which has lately admitted access to Sudbury rivers and valleys. The very name of Boston suggests water, and in every way equal if not surpass that of London is very certain.

No city in the world possesses the advantages of New York. When the obstructions to navigation at Hell Gate are removed, which can easily be done, as was demonstrated by the sagacious operations of HENRY GRINNELL, we shall have a magnificent sea-way by an improved channel for the largest ships. Our means of communication by way of Sandy Hook are sufficient for all present purposes, and are superior to those of any other port. The commerce of the whole world may have easy access to our wharves.

Our communications with the vast interior of our country and with Canada are equally convenient. High mountains are interposed between the interior and other Atlantic cities, except Philadelphia, which is united valley, that of the Mohawk, which breaks through the Alleghany at Little Falls, and that of the Hudson, which breaks through the range at West Point, our trade with the interior is unobstructed. With Canada we have easy communication, as the highest elevation is only about 110 feet. We have improved ourselves of these physical advantages by widening and deepening the Erie Canal and the canal connecting with Lake Champlain, and in time by a ship canal from Lake Champlain to the St. Lawrence, and thus provided none but territorial limits can be assigned to the growth of population which will inhabit New York, Long Island, Jersey City, Hoboken, and Westchester. The supply of this city and of the lower part of Westchester must engage the attention of our Legislature, which as they become under one municipality or remain under separate local governments.

The Commissioners who introduced the Croton into the city made an examination of the Bronx, and wisely decided not to use it. It were damned at Bronxville on the reservoir at that point would be an elevation of about seventy feet above tide, from which much of the lower part of Westchester could be supplied. The village of White Plains, which is growing rapidly, endeavored to obtain the right to take water from the Bronx for the use of the village; but Rye Pond, one of the most important feeders of the Bronx, will doubtless be used for that purpose, as it is supplied chiefly by springs, is located at a sufficient elevation above White Plains, and is only about three miles distant. It is probable that the Bronx will furnish enough water for as many residents as will congregate in the lower part of the county for perhaps fifty years.

The Croton aqueduct, which commences in Westchester, and runs for nearly thirty miles along and near the banks of the Hudson in that county, has not been tapped except as the State prison. The only case in which permission to do so was given was that of a gentleman who had performed services in respect to the sewerage of the city, but on reflection he decided to avail himself of the permission, as he feared that, if repeated, irreparable damage might result from it.

Mr. COPPIN was at the time President of the Board. The aqueduct is constructed to deliver, as its maximum, sixty millions of gallons per day, which it regularly does, furnishing to each of a million of inhabitants sixty gallons of water per diem. The Croton River not only supplies this quantity, but throws a large excess over the dam for nine months in the year. During the heats of summer it occasionally happens that a much smaller quantity runs into the dam than the aqueduct carries. But at Boyd's Corners on the west branch of the Croton a storage reservoir is being constructed sufficiently to hold enough, added to the minicompetent to hold enough, added to the minimum supply from all the branches, to deliver into the aqueduct all that it can take.

The drainage area of this reservoir is about 20 miles, and contains the extreme northwestern portion of Croton Valley. The reservoir is over 60 miles from the city, at an elevation of 600 feet above tide, and is in an extremely wild district, sparsely populated. It will cover 303 acres of land, and will store 3,369,206,859 gallons of water. On its completion, which will be in about two years, this reservoir alone will supply the whole quantity required for forty-five days, if it all reaches the main dam, not reckoning other sources of supply; but, as the reservoir is 23 miles from the dam, some of the water will be absorbed, but the quantity will be but little in excess of what the stream will at the same time furnish to the reservoir. No apprehension need be entertained that the aqueduct will not furnish the city throughout every year, after this new work is completed, its full complement of sixty millions of gallons daily.

Many parts of London are supplied by their aqueducts with only twelve gallons per day to each inhabitant, and the result is that we make the quantity suffices. What we receive would be deemed luxurious by any but the most wasteful people. In winter, to prevent injury to the pipes by the freezing of the water, it is allowed to run both night and day—a contingency against which the English are not required to guard; and much of the water here is used for ornamental purposes—an object which ought to be encouraged up to the point beyond which inconvenience of a domestic character would result. No city in Europe without a far abundant supply of water, delivered into houses from such an elevation that it becomes after use the power or carrier for removing the refuse through the sewers. The primary system of New England, which fortunately extends to the coast here, where it runs out, enables us to obtain and introduce water in a high elevation and of a pure quality. And it will contribute to the growth of the city to keep up a luxurious supply. London is now discussing the question what means will be used to introduce water from a river in Wales, over a hundred miles distant, and will decide to introduce it at vast expense, inasmuch as the health and prosperity of the city depend upon it.

Many of the diseases which prevail owe their origin, and frequently their malignant type, to the impure water supply, and there will be no destination to make whatever outlay may be required within our means to maintain forever a proper supply. The bounteousness of nature to our city is conspicuous in the means which are afforded for obtaining water for an enormous population. The valley of the Croton has a drainage area of 360 square miles in twenty counties, containing chiefly the soil and the rocks of the primary system. The mountain range which crosses the Hudson from Peekskill to near West Point constitutes the bulk of this region, which extends very little beyond the Connecticut line. In the various valleys formed by the streams, and which are branches of the Croton and their affluents there are no less than fifteen convenient spots in which storing reservoirs may be built, the joint capacity of which will exceed sixty billions of gallons. The district is already studded with numerous lakes and ponds, the outlets of which run very evenly, forming, with the artificial means which may be provided at moderate expense, such conveniences for storing water as our growth in population may hereafter require.

In time it will undoubtedly be necessary to add to the capacity of the aqueduct, or build a new one. Whatever quantity might be introduced, advantage would result from it even if duced, advantage would result from it even if much too large for domestic purposes. Skill will employ itself to devise some cheap mode of using the Croton as a power in domestic industry; and the time may not be distant when, in addition to the luxurious supply of pure water with which we are now blessed, the women of the city, in their own dwellings, may use the Croton as the power to work their sewing-machines at a trifling expense, and without inconvenience. Among the benefits conferred by the Croton the ease which it contributes to the performance of household labors is of great importance, and of itself justifies the outlay. The men who had charge of the work, among whom STEPHEN ALLEN was conspicuous, deserve the warmest thanks for what they did, as they conducted it with a purity which has not been known in recent years, fitly represented by what they introduced, and with such inestimable advantage.

The alarm which has recently been stirred up about polluting the water is due in great part to the exigencies of a personal lawsuit. The situation of the district is favorable to exemption from this danger, but yet it will be wise to ask from the legislative power the means to prevent—while the population is not full—the introduction of those industries which render streams impure. There are enough which may be pursued in harmony with the interests of the people there and the vital interests of New York in the Croton Valley.

Plans for supplying White Plains and the lower part of Westchester will no doubt be placed before the Legislature next winter, and as they concern the highest interests of their respective localities, it is to be hoped that they will be devised in the spirit which animated STEPHEN ALLEN and his coadjutors, and be acted upon by the Legislature without the necessity of purchasing a vote.

New York will soon need to follow; but we shudder to think what a difference we shall experience and what objects and influences which shall govern our present management in constructing a new aqueduct, as compared with those which directed the old and justly honored sachems of Tammany.

THE PERSONAL INFALLIBILITY OF THE POPE.

ROOMS are already engaged in Rome by persons thousands of miles away who hope to reach the city in time for the Œcumenical Council next winter. This Council, or assembly of the whole body of the faithful, calls for the Church and proclaims dogmas; and the absorbing interest of the proposed Council is, that if it should meet, the Pope is understood to wish it to pronounce the absolute personal infallibility of the incumbent of the Holy See. This claim is so portentous that the French Churchmen especially, and even the Jesuits, are alarmed, foreseeing the inevitable danger of such a declaration. Their ground of course is that, so long as the Church claims infallibility in spiritual subjects alone, infallibility can never be put to the proof. If it declares, for instance, that a certain act is a mortal sin and will damn a soul eternally, in such case it is impossible, because nobody can prove that a soul is not damned eternally. Consequently any Church or any man may claim absolute infallibility upon such subjects, conscious that the claim can never be disproved.

Moreover, so long as the whole Church must pronounce, it is always easy to delay or to confuse the decision. But the case is very different when perfect infallibility is claimed for any individual man. His word upon every subject would then be identical with truth. He could declare the essential conditions of salvation. It would be in vain that his infallibility would be proclaimed to be limited. When a universal Council once answered the personal claim to infallibility of the Pope, his word would be to the faithful the word of God. He would need only to declare this or that the condition of acceptance with God, and his "children" would obediently listen. But while this would be the result within the pale of his ecclesiastical fidelity, it would be only the result beyond the borders. The Pope is by no means always selected for his wisdom or his virtue. The history of the Papacy shows in the history of as much envy and hatred and wretched intrigue as are to be found in any secular convention, and as much gross, fanatical ecclesiastic might become the most fatal enemy of his Church as in the degree of his sincere and narrow devotion to her. A man like the late Pope GREGORY THE SIXTEENTH, ignorant in the chair of ST. PETER as absolutely infallible Head of the Church, might readily do what all the "infidels" have never been able to accomplish.

If, for instance, he should declare as truth essential to salvation something which science should presently and plainly disprove, the plight would be of the most that no Church could endure it. If, with absolute personal infallibility, he should abandon himself to such foolish and trenchant fanaticisms of the freedom of the press, for instance, or of scientific investigation, as appeared in the encyclical letter of the present Pope two years ago, the effect would be immense and pernicious to his own cause. What sort of a Church is it whose infallible Head decrees that the sun goes round the earth, or that the Mosaic cosmogony is literally and limitedly exact? would be the perilous question which could not be satisfactorily answered. And this is the dilemma which the Jesuits and the Frenchmen foresee, and which, if peopled, they would avoid. The Papal opportunity of asserting as true what could be conclusively shown to be false must not, in their judgment, be allowed.

The power of the Pope for good results would, of course, be increased by the decree which PIUS THE NINTH is understood to favor. He might make the cardinal virtues instead of theological dogmas the essentials to salvation. He might supervise education. He might insist upon a real liberty. Indeed, he might do all that the supporters of vast arbitrary power seem to imagine such potentates will do. But the probabilities are always against the wise use of such a prerogative as is now sought; and there is no method whatever of securing the continuance of such a use. Decree the absolute infallibility of the Pope, and any ignorant priest, crowned with the triple tiara, could undo the work of the wisest pontiff. Indeed, the present Pope, who is approaching the remarkable term of a quarter of a century in the pontificate, is not a man of such sagacity that his own career and reputation are likely to strengthen his demand. If the Council should assemble and decree as he desires, the sincerest enemies of his Church ought to be satisfied.

INSULTS TO GENERAL GRANT.

MR. ANDREW JOHNSON, if the report of a conversation with him be correct—and the World publishes the report—is of opinion that General GRANT is "a farce," and "a little fellow," and "treacherous," and that he "lied flagrantly," and that his presence in the White House is "degrading" to the Presidency. In the words of the Declaration, which are very familiar to us all at this season, it would seem that "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind" would make MR. ANDREW JOHNSON extremely careful of allusions to treachery and degradation in connection with the Presidency of the United States.

It is the fate of the greatest benefactors of their country to be subject to slander. The old Aurora said as foul things of WASHINGTON as ever the rebel and Democratic newspapers said of LINCOLN, or as MR. ANDREW JOHNSON and the World say of General GRANT. But somehow the people thought that the Aurora calumny or the Copperhead hiss could hardly lessen the lustre of the inestimable national services of WASHINGTON and LINCOLN, and when they read the feeble insults of MR. ANDREW JOHNSON and the World upon a man whose career is as clear as the sun, has been, in the words of the amusing college song, "they don't seem to take no kind of interest in it."

THE EMPIRE.

THERE is a paper published in New York which is called the Empire. It is so ashamed of the happiness of France, and so dismayed by the ruin of this republic, that it endeavors to relieve itself from the misery and slavery in which we are involved but in an empire. That indeed is peace. That is happiness and prosperity and prosperity. If that great and good CÆSAR LOUIS BONAPARTE should by any thing is so dear as liberty and individual rights, would only graciously consent to bestow his imperial son upon us for a ruler—that son of whose mother General DIX has declared that no such prodigiously amiable things in Paris—that's a happy day it would be! what a fortunate day indeed!

See the immense advantages of imperialism. In this wretched country, where we not only labor under the incubus of a republic, but a republic which secures liberty of speech and of the press—which a foolish and unimperial philosophy supposes to be essential to a good and progressive government—the paper like the Empire may denounce and deride the Government and its officers at its own sweet will, and with exemption from all fear from any body. If it can, it may persuade the people of the country to install a wise and virtuous WIGFALL, or NAPOLEON, or a "Christian gentleman" like LEE or FORREST, and the Government—and nobody, least of all the Government, will interfere with its endeavors. But in France, in the empire which is peace and liberty and prosperity, we read that MR. HENRY ROCHEFORT, the editor of a newspaper, has been sentenced to three years' imprisonment, and to pay a fine of three thousand francs, and is deprived for three years of the right to vote or to sit in the Legislative Assembly; and all this because he derides and denounces the benign and peaceable empire.

This is the kind of system which is to restore to us the liberties of which a ruthless mob has deprived us, and the advantages are only too evident. So, too, we observe that the great and good French CÆSAR has graciously remarked to the Bishop of Beauvais that "the addresses of bishops, couched in the language of piety, are always received with deference." Such soothing snakes so wondrous kind. The rule of the Pope in his Church is the rule by that which the French CÆSAR desires in his State, or it will be so, if the Pope can only persuade the Œcumenical Council next winter to declare the absolute personal infallibility of the Holy Father. The next step in the progress of our liberties and prosperity is thus made evident. With an emperor to regulate our personal freedom, including that of speech and the press, and a Pope to determine our religious faith and the limits of our mental activity, the republic, not to speak lightly, may hang up its fiddle and its bow, and every happy subject of the empire receive his opinions and his rule of conduct from imperial and papal headquarters.

That astute statesman, MR. F. P. BLAIR, JUN., of Missouri, has risen so far into a millstone as any body, warned his country last year that he was the path of safety, while the darkly designing despot GRANT would never leave the White House if he once entered it, but would remain there an emperor. The ghastly truth now appears! "I smell a rat; I'll crush him in the bud!" exclaimed a fervent orator. It is not plain to every body whom MR. F. P. BLAIR, JUN., convicted of GRANT'S nefarious designs that the Imperialist is his first stealthy movement toward the imperial throne, and that the crown which it bears upon its front is the one that he proposes to transfer to his brow?

FRIENDLY WORDS.

THIS speech of GOLDWIN SMITH at Toronto, which was curiously distorted in the telegraphic report, has been delivered also in the Cornell Era at Ithaca. The two following extracts will do harm him with those who know how truly and in the best sense he is an English friend of America. In speaking of MR. SUMNER'S speech he says:

"I was perhaps the only Englishman resident in the States, except those connected with the diplomatic service and whose tongues were tied, who had for several years been in correspondence with that gentleman, and, moreover, Mr. Sumner is not in the habit of using more than personal; and I had observed with regret that before it came journal a lively editorial attacking a rival editor as a fool and a knave."

GOLDWIN SMITH is not the only Englishman or American who makes a broad distinction between private and public malice, as in this passage:

"It is not of the American people that I am speaking. The more I see of the American people the more I acknowledge and admire their virtues. And the more confident do I feel that they will decide in accordance with the dictates of reason and morality any question submitted to their deliberate judgment and fairly presented to their minds. I am not afraid, I say, of the people. But I am afraid in an excess of patriotism or virtue on the part of the politicians. I think it probable that in the coming campaign, and under certain inducements, the politicians might be led by their spirit of self-sacrifice to do something too generous and too sublime. The other day I was reading a pretty fast, as it seemed to me, in a direction in which I do not like to see it going. Some fatal consequence would have almost certainly ensued. The attitude of England in regard to this question is perfectly intelligible, and her language perfectly distinct. Her wish is that you should unconditionally done by her Government, or by any of the officers employed thereat, to a friendly nation, we are ready and willing to make full reparation. If we are ready and willing, also, in addition to any pecuniary damage which we may have caused you, to offer you, with an acknowledgement as, in a case of unintentional injury, we should be ready and willing to make to another in private life, provided only we are not accused in the style in which one man of honor accosts another, and not in the style of MR. SUMNER'S speech."

THE CASE OF MR. WARREN.

IT is telegraphed from Paris that MR. J. Q. WARREN, an American citizen, has made a formal complaint to our Minister of arrest and illtreatment by the French authorities during the late riots in that city, and demands compensation. This is a claim which we presume MR. WASHBURNE will not press upon the Imperial Government. Those Americans who remember the manner in which the most innocent and even unwilling spectators or participators in street excitements and troubles are treated by paternal governments in Europe will readily believe that MR. WARREN does not exaggerate the brutality of the treatment to which he was exposed. He saw the police pursuing a crowd. He stepped into a side-street to avoid trouble. But he was followed by the police, seized, knocked down, clubbed, handcuffed, and illtreated for two days.

Of course in a revolutionary city like Paris a man expects to take risks and to be exposed to a peaceable man, retiring so as not to increase disorder, does not expect to have his head broken and to be abused.

We presume that the French Government will instantly apologize and offer to atone for the offense. Indeed we shall not be surprised if it is all done before these lines are read. Americans are universal travelers. It is estimated that at least fifty thousand are now traveling in Europe for enjoyment and instruction. They are learning, of course, to respect carefully the laws of the countries into which they choose to go; but that being done, those countries are to respect the rights of foreign citizens. We shall expect to see, also, that in making representations to the French Government, our Minister takes that tone of firmness and courtesy which is always becoming, and which now is peculiarly representative of the high character and good name of the Administration.

NOTES.

IS "FIVE ACRES TOO MUCH," by ROBERT B. ROOSEVELT, just published by G. P. PUTNAM, HARPER, the reader will find a good-humored smile, if not laugh, upon every page. It is a most pleasant little satire upon the country excitement for having an urban rustic, and is an excellent pendant to that volume of MR. STARBOWGRASS which no gentleman's library should be without, and which is to be found in every well-regulated collection. There is no little book published during the season which should be so universally laid away for immediate summer reading as this.

THE HARPERS have also issued "My Daughter Elinor," a novel of American life, by a hand that we do not recognize as familiar. There are capital scenes in the book; and the interest is skillfully maintained by the play of not very original characters. It is the work of an author who has a sensitive eye for incident and character, but whose training and sympathy we should suppose to be not distinctively American. The style is lively and agreeable.

THE crayon drawings of JOHN W. EMMENDE, representing the two famous incidents in the war, the ride of SHERIDAN and the lashing of FARRAGUT in the rigging, which were bought by the Union League Club, and are now in their gallery, have been most admirably photographed by GRAHAM BROTHERS, and the prints may be found at MR. PILKINGTON JACKSON'S, 58 East Thirteenth Street. The spirit and simplicity of these drawings make the essential poetry of the subjects, which the artist has rendered with power, especially interesting souvenirs both of our military and naval renown. We can heartily commend them to our readers.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE diminution of the public debt in June is estimated at sixteen millions.

MR. GEORGE CRUIKSHANK, who is now in his country, has added a million of dollars, in railroad and other bonds, realized in June, to the "Peabody Education Fund," also $3,000 in Florida at 85 per cent, and twenty-five hundred pounds.

A sad accident occurred at the central shaft of the Bunker Hill coal mines, near Wilkesbarre, on Thursday morning last. Five of the miners on the lower platform wishing to ascend to the surface, rode there for the purpose of ascending. Three of the men took hold of the rope, and were lifted by the hoist of dirt, and the two stood up in the bucket. The engineer who had charge of the machinery let the bucket fall with greater velocity than usual, and it striking the lower platform, three of the men were crushed to death. Three of the the bucket, were precipitated to the bottom, and in that, killing two and severely injuring two others.

The monument to HIRAM POWERS, born Woodstock, Connecticut, was dedicated July 5, at Guilford, Vermont.

Severe shocks of earthquake have recently been felt at various points along the Pacific coast.

The London Star was rather lately in assuming that the final defeat and departure of the Cuban expedition from this port was true. Its comments read somewhat strangely when taken in connection with the facts of the case as recently developed.

The Fourth of July, this year, was made for the number of casualties that occurred in the vicinity during its progress. Fatal accidents seem to have been most exposed to its ravages, and the shores of Western Long Island Sound, the Newark Bay, were wrecked and their seamen lost; at Rockaway the people of a hotel were thrown to the floor in the parlor in which they were assembled, and a gentleman in the city, caught on the roof of his house by lightning and killed; and in many parts of Westchester County, as well as in the city, accidents of other damage done. In Philadelphia there was quite a bonanza.

FOREIGN NEWS.

JOHN MACGREGOR, captain of the famous canoe Rob Roy, has challenged the Harvard crew to another race on the Thames, to be rowed with the English crew-builder.

In the United States of Colombia the coming elections for President and Congress attract attention. The chances of Moriquera were regarded as favorable.

The session of the Spanish Cortes Legislatif opened on June 28. The Emperor and Empress attended. The Bunker mansion at Lynn, Mass., was burned.

Henri Rochefort, editor of the Lanterne, has been convicted of libel, of introducing that journal illegally into France. He has been sentenced to three years' imprisonment, to pay a fine of 3000 francs, and to have added the forfeiture of the right to vote in any election, or to sit in the Corps Legislatif.

M. M. Simonson and Jordan, editors of the Siècle, have been fined each 500 francs, and each editor of the Opinion Nationale has been sentenced to one month's imprisonment with a fine of 500 francs, all for violations of the press laws.

A report which comes from a Brazilian source, states that Paraguay has offered to purchase, through General M'Mahon, the American Minister, to surrender to the allies the condition that he granted his personal freedom and be permitted to leave the country without molestation.

From Hong-Kong, China, we learn that a great and decisive battle has been fought between the Imperialists and the Mohammedan rebels. The latter were defeated, with a loss of 20,000 men.

The Viceroy of Egypt, after his visit to England, has been received by the Queen with extraordinary courtesy, departed for Brussels, where he arrived July 2.

The Œcumenical Council at Rome has been postponed a year.

Our late advices from Cuba report a serious insubordination among the Catalonian volunteers. General Letona imprisoned their Colonel, and they have joined the Cuban insurgents. Havanese letters have reported that a number of Americans, captured by the Spanish authorities, have been released. The Captain General De Rodas, in a public speech, has advised the Spanish to show more moderation, and more to conciliate all classes, and cease publishing irritating articles, especially in regard to Indies.

SUMMER.

HON. GEORGE M. ROBESON,
SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

THE HON. GEORGE M. ROBESON, lately appointed Secretary of the Navy, in the place of Hon. A. H. BOBIE, resigned, is a native of New Jersey, and a son of Judge WILLIAM P. ROBESON, of Warren County, who was formerly a leading Whig, and prominently connected with the politics of his State. Mr. ROBESON is a graduate of Princeton College of the class of 1847. He studied law in the office of Chief-Justice HORNBLOWER in Newark. In 1859 he was appointed Prosecutor of Pleas for Camden County. On the election of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN as Senator, in 1867, Mr. ROBESON was appointed by Governor WARD Attorney-General, which position he resigned for his new duties. He is about forty-five years of age, and justly holds high rank in his profession. Mr. ROBESON is a strong and decided Republican. It is somewhat curious that the only position ever held in the Cabinet by a citizen of New Jersey has been that of Secretary of the Navy.

HON. GEORGE M. ROBESON, SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.—[PHOT. BY BRADY, WASHINGTON.]

CAPTURE OF COLONEL BYRON'S CUBAN EXPEDITION.

SECRETARY FISH evidently intends to execute our neutrality laws. Learning from the United States Marshal and the United States District-Attorney that a filibustering expedition was on the point of starting from this port, carrying men, arms, and other war supplies for the aid of the Cubans, he ordered the revenue cutters Mahoning and M'Culloch, on the 29th of June, to proceed up Long Island Sound in pursuit of the Cuban expedition which was reported to have left this city for Gardiner's Island, on the Long Island coast, and within a short distance of the ocean. The information upon which the Secretary acted was furnished by a recruit who had deserted. He said that three tug-boats lay off the island named the H. D. Coole, Jonathan Chase, and Wm. H. Webb, which carried troops who were about to sail for the invasion of Cuba, and that they were waiting for the appearance of the steamer Catharine Whiting, which was to take them to sea. Shortly after six o'clock in the evening the revenue cutters came in sight of the tug-boats Coole and Webb, which were quickly recognized as the objects of the search. They were about five miles from Fort Schuyler, and were coming down the Sound, but stopped when two shots from the cutters made known to those on board that it was dangerous to attempt to escape. Both tugs were boarded, and were found to contain upward of one hundred men, the majority being on the Coole, which was the largest boat. The M'Culloch took charge of the Coole, and the Mahoning of the Webb. After signaling with rockets, the revenue officers decided to anchor off Fort Schuyler for the night, with the captured vessels under their stern and in range of their guns, which were ready for use in case the prizes should endeavor to run away.

No resistance was offered by the filibusters, who were in an almost famished condition. The captured boats were conveyed to the Brooklyn Navy-yard on the morning of the 30th, and the prisoners were then transferred to the United States Receiving Ship Vermont.

The men who were caught formed a portion of Colonel JOHN WHITEHEAD BYRON'S command, that officer being one of the prisoners. He was on board the Coole at the time of her arrival at the Navy-yard, but subsequently made his escape in a most daring manner. He made two attempts, the last of which was successful. On the first he managed to get off the tug-boat without detection, after which he passed through the Navy-yard to the outer gate on York Street, when he was brought to a halt by a sentinel. He was then identified and taken back among his comrades. About ten o'clock on the morning of the 30th he disappeared a second time, and was not recaptured. It was supposed that he left in disguise. Among those who were found on board the Coole were Señor ALFARO, the Secretary of War of the Cuban Junta, and Dr. BASORA, also belonging to the Junta.

Since the 30th the remainder of the expedition has been captured.

THE "WELCOME STRANGER."

THE other day the telegraphic wires flashed throughout Australia the startling announcement that a nugget had been unearthed, the largest ever seen, that it was heavy lifting for two men to put it on a dray, that it weighed about two thousand ounces, and was worth ten thousand pounds sterling. However startling it may appear, the announcement was perfectly true. The monster nugget was found at a place called Mohagal, about eight miles from Dunolly. A local paper, the Dunolly Express, gives the following particulars of the event: "The Dunolly district, after having turned out a multitude of nuggets that pats every other gold-field in the colony in the shade, has at length, in the words of the Melbourne journals, 'beat the world' in producing the largest mass of gold on record. The 'Welcome Stranger' was found by two men, named JOHN DEASON and RICHARD OATES, on Friday, 5th February, 1869, near the Black Reef, Bull-dog Gully, Mohagal, a short distance from Wayman's Reef, and only about a mile from the celebrated Gipsy Diggings. DEASON and his mate have been working in the ground for several years past, and, as is well known, had got, in digging parlance, so 'hard-up' as to have been refused credit for a log of flour a week or so ago, and we believe the very day before the discovery were reminded by a tradesman that they were indebted to him a few shillings. Still they persevered, until on the day named DEASON, in working round the roots of a tree, at about two inches below the surface, struck something hard with a pick, and exclaimed, 'D—n it, I wish it was a nugget, and had broken the pick!' On stooping down to examine the obstacle he found that the object of his dearest wishes was lying at his feet, and it seemed as if the monster was so large as to be immovable. It was, however, at length released from its virgin soil and carefully removed. The question then arose as to what was to be done with it, and the first intention was to convey it to Melbourne. When the men got to Dunolly with their prize they were advised to take it to the bank, and forthwith carried it to the London Chartered. The news of the discovery soon spread, and the bank was crowded with eager spectators, among whom were a number of Chinamen; and a constable was sent for to guard the prize. The weight in the gross was then found to be 210 pounds troy, and preparations were at once made to break the mass to pieces and smelt it. The appearance of the 'Welcome Stranger' in its pristine state was something wonderful, and it seemed impossible to realize the fact that so great a mass of gold could be collected in one lump. But so it was. Many efforts were made to lift it, and many exclamations of surprise expressed at its immense weight and compactness. A sledge-hammer and cold chisels were brought into requisition, and several of the latter broken in the attempt to reduce into fragments the 'Welcome Stranger.' It was found to be as solid as it looked, and as chip after chip and piece after piece was disserved from it, its appearance was as clean as a well-cut Cheshire

CHAPTER XXIII.

EVE AND HER APPLE.

IT was daybreak at Auriol, and country-bred Azalea awoke as naturally with the dawn as did the quick-eyed swallows who lived in the eaves above her window. She lay still a while, watching the wan sun-streaks lengthen over the brown furrowed upland, and listening to the clump of the farm horses' feet as they trotted down toward the misty water brink to drink. It was that pale mysterious hour when the hush of night passing away from the earth's face place to grey dawn which is as obscure and indistinct in its nature as a dying man's wanderings are the babble of his tongue ere death and joy: feeble noises before the brightness of God. The night clouds had rolled away, but they had not yet brushed out the dull stars of the sky; the dark form of night moving stilly down the meadow; the mist that clammed the outline of sky and earth together—all was chill uncertainty of aspect.

A few hours later and the avenue was alive with the cheerful clamour of birds; the wild-fowl dashed its breast down a sunlit stream; the waterfalls sparkled their mad delight over glistening pebbles; the warm wind dried the wetfaced roses; the cat crept out to make her toilet of clean paws and smoothed ears; and Azalea stood at her window, the freshest and fairest object the morning sun shone on.

"Oh, what a lovely morning it is!" she said, as she stood there drinking in breaths of sweet sunshiny air.

When she was dressed she walked softly down the stairs so as not to disturb Moore, and consulted the worn face of the old clock that stood in the hall. It was too early to busy herself in the sitting-room yet; to go through her little duties of dusting and arranging the massive furniture and preparing breakfast. Her father slept overhead, and the light, doubtful slumbers of age are easily disturbed; so Azalea took the large garden basket off its peg and decided to go out and gather some flowers with which to make the dusty old chambers bright when she returned.

She sang to herself as she walked down the path under the cross lights and shadows of the avenue. She was seventeen, her heart unruffled by trouble, her eyes bright with unconcern. She was as free and unfettered of spirit as the wild birds that carolled noisily above her head, and like them she involuntarily sang out her appreciation of the fresh beauty of the morning.

It was a pity that human sadness should ever shame such a day of light. It was a pity that this girl, as happy and sinless as the dumb companions of her solitude, could not die as she was living now, with the sunshine blessing her head, and with a soul so pure that she might have gone straight to her mother's breast in paradise without treading the bolder questioning of those celestial eyes.

After a while Azalea paused to contemplate the contents of her basket; there were lilies-of-the-valley shaking down small dew-drops among the cool green leaves that sheathed their fragrant, white bells; there was red descriptions, from the luxurious damask to the delicate rose de mot, were heaped promiscuously together, piercing each other's tender petals with their thorns; bunches of wistaria, sweetest and most graceful of all the pensile blossoms, hung languidly over the basket's wicker edge; the fleur-de-lis dropped its stately head across the heavy breadth of the peony; and the homely-looking buds of calicanthus shed the influence of their rare perfume over all.

"Oh!" said Azalea, plunging her little face into the dewy masses of blossom with an expression of ecstatic enjoyment, "I love them."

Then she looked wistfully at the hedgerow which divided the shrubberies from that lane which led to the little village of Auriol.

"If I get over there I can gather some ferns."

Getting over there involved climbing to the summit of a steep bank, forcing herself through a barricade of thick, dense nut-boughs, and then clinging to the rough wet sides of an oak-tree while she slipped down into the ditch on the opposite side.

She hesitated a moment, fearing the contingencies of scratched hands and torn clothes. She scrambled up a few steps and peeped over the hedgerow. Then

That ditch contained beauties scarcely inferior to the gay-hued, rich-scented garden plants which it bounded, and Azalea's fingers flashed at the thick masses of fern, waving crossways at the foot of the bank with a wild grace all their own.

"I must have some," she thought, "to drop over the sides of the vases."

She fixed her basket between two boughs of the oak, and then clasping one hand round another branch, commenced her descent. She felt her way with her feet until she found a secure root on which to support them, and then she paused.

"If I jump I shall jar my legs, if I slip down I shall scratch them; I don't much mind that, but the dress is sure to get caught by a bramble or other, and then daddy will say, 'There you go again, Azalea, always in rags;' and I so detest mending them. If my wings were here to give me a hand I could jump easily."

She looked up and down the misty lane, but saw nothing but a jackdaw looking very wise as it dissected its early breakfast.

"If there were but an old woman or a boy."

There was the hum of the distant sound in the wind, a stone-picker, some fields distant, and the red neckerchief of a bird-boy, making a bright spot in a far hedgerow. Azalea was ashamed to not make them hear, nor if they had heard would they have heeded her. She was in that position in which poor children are sometimes left to help itself, afraid to go on, loth to draw back, and so pain to stay where she was.

"I'll call it," she said, suddenly; and she was in the act of withdrawing her arm from the friendly branch when a strange sound struck upon her ears.

Something quite different from trill of bird or hum of insect was that quick clang of notes that rose up between the wet hedgerows at the foot of that quiet lane. There was something plaintive in it too—something harsh, like human pain. There was none of the full consonance of the blackbird's note in it.

"What can it be?" wondered Azalea, postponing her jump into the fern bed; "I never heard it before."

If the little girl had gathered up herself, legs, basket, and all, and ran back in the woods, where she could hear it no more, it might have been better for her.

She had not long to wait before a solution of the mysterious sounds came in sight, and the solution was even more wonderful than the mystery. Gleaming through the green fringe of the hedgerows, passing in a quick stream of light by many clusters of woodbine, and the flower of hedgenets and a tons of red and white plumes.

From some unexplainable impulse Azalea made a desperate effort to spring down into the bank, but she was too late; it would have required three or four scrambles to reach her old height; and not liking to attempt the latter, struggle she remained motionless while the procession streamed nearer, and the whole length of path resounded with the clang of steel feet.

The green shadows, the dewy lights, all were broken up and patched by vivid red-coats, the scarlet rustling of flags, the white flash of the champ of their bits, the hurried jingle of spurs, the sharp bright lines of steel that hung from the men's left sides, the plumes as large as beaverlike yet festal symbols of death over the bearded faces that showed beneath the sharp-pointed helms—all passed in a brilliant line, yet awful picture before Azalea's amazed eyes.

The whole of this gorgeous, grass-grown shadowed road was stirred by the warlike commotion. The sheep in the opposite field bubbled away in patters, the wood pigeons overlooked at the intruders with calm dewy-eyed wonder; the daisies under foot, which had lived unmolested under the slow tread of lazy carthorses, were crushed to the ground by the merciless precision of those serried lines of tramping hoofs; the jackdaw disappeared in a hole in a tree looked wise on the safe side of the hedge. All the little harmless flutters of life that were wont to make innocent music in this quiet lane were overpowered by the gay clangor of the martial cavalcade that swept like a flame of fire through the densely-shadowed lane.

As the tramp and the jingle drew nearer Azalea involuntarily tightened her hold on the branch overhead, and in so doing dislodged the basket of flowers, already top-heavy with its fragrant burden. Over it turned, and roses and lilies, fleur-de-lis and wistaria, showered down on to Azalea's head, shoulders, and feet. One plump rose descended on her shoes, and then fell to pieces—one bunch of the fragile wistaria lingered lovingly near her ear. The fleur-de-lis shook yellow powder on to her hands, and then slipped down to the ditch; indeed, the ferns below were oppressed by a perfect avalanche of blossoms.

Azalea scarcely heeded the catastrophe; her wide eyes were filled with wonder at the advancing spectacle; yet when the troop of horsemen came near her she shrank as far as she could behind the shadow of the oak, and fervently wished that she could escape up its branches as quickly as that deft squirrel that was curling up in its tail at a cautious altitude of some dozen boughs nearer the sky.

The reader will understand that a cavalry regiment was moving through Essex en route to another county, and that a troop which had been billeted at an adjacent village during the night were now on the march again, passing by the Auriol estate as the shortest cut to the highroad. A bustle on ever-quiet Sheparting—a friendly smoke overnight with the inn-keeper—a champing of many horses' mouths in the stables as a swing into the saddle when the early rime still clung to the wall-flower and cottage latch—a kiss to the inn-keeper's daughter watching them carefully over the wash-tub. Every-day events so practical it does not admit of wasting time in sentiment; at least the injurious self-torture engendered by heart-ache is spared to the bevies of wood and drawers of water. There is no space for it when mouths have to be filled and brains clothed by dint of sheer exertion.

The reader will understand all this; but he must not be too contemptuous of the thing to even of a girl like Azalea this was far from being any thing so commonplace as a troop of horse moving from one station to another. To her it was a magnificent poem, and those red coats and dancing plumes were the emblems of valor and death. She had seen those living soldiers before, but she had read of their deeds and learned to reverence the names of those our country's records have inscribed with honor. There must have been inherited chivalry in her blood, or it would not have flushed her cheek so brightly as she followed the troop with her eyes, and made her thought that she too would like to dia amidst the red light of battle and the sonorous roll of drums. She had never seen a wild-born man despise her; you or I might feel that death would be as unpleasant to meet in the uproar of battle as in the decent quietude of a wind-blown room; but youth may be permitted to have its delusions —to fancy that bright colors and joyous music never elected a coward, and that dying men are disinthrall it from mortal terrors. Such delusions are the blossoms of life. They will fall soon enough to the earth and shake the tree.

Azalea's unpracticed eyes (confused as they were by the novelty of the scene) did not detect that one of the troopers was more richly dressed than the others; that it was real gold-lace that gleamed on his coat; and that the delicacy of a female breeding was visible in the silver skin and her mustache than was owned by the rest of his companions.

This was the officer in command, Captain Thurstan Mowbray; and this gentleman had never ceased looking from the time of his passing the village hostelry until he came opposite the Auriol woods. Then the languor in his face gave way to excitement, and his eyes never over the variously-tinted waves of foliage, and noted the old red gables of the house visible through the breaks in the trees, and sometimes he could see the shimmer of a sunlit casement, or followed with his gaze the herds of deer passing in line over the most open parts of the pasture.

"A beautiful old place!" he murmured. "To think that there should be no smoke from those chimneys. I suppose they have been stuffed with martins' nests for these last dozen years. Oh, if one had but money!"

The lower part of the sky, the little girl in her niche following them with adoring eyes. If she could only have heard what the commander of that grand cavalcade was sighing out between his mustache, her exalted estimate of one of the brilliant throng would have been slightly lowered.

"Oh, if one had but money!" No reference to splendid deeds of heroism—to old banners torn in honor—to the haughty and gloriously yielded 'midst rolls of smoke and clang of arms —came from that perplexed-looking young officer, whose whole existence may was his tailor, and who had never led a forlorn hope against any fortress more impregnable than a certain office in Craig's Court.

The color, the noise, the bronzed faces had passed Azalea's dazzled eyes, and were growing dimmer and indistinct far down the lane, when Captain Mowbray took it into his head to turn round in his saddle and give a last look at his father's deserted home. In scanning the broken palings overran with ivy, and wondering how much money it would take to uplift and straighten their time-warped sides, his eyes fell on the oak, and then on the living creature clinging to its side. Even at this distance he saw the gleam of fair hair; and if there was one thing in woman more attractive than another to Captain Mowbray, it was fairness.

His bold dark eyes flashed, and his handsome face woke into new life in an instant. A quick glance at the immovable forms of his companions showed him that he was alone in his discovery. The men had taken a cursory glance at the pretty wild flowers that bloomed down the bank, but it was reserved for their officer to detect the rare specimens that were still clinging to Azalea's feet and shoulders.

"I believe—I am almost sure—she is pretty. I'll go and have a look at her."

What else could you expect from a young gentleman who had been wearying away so many uninteresting hours on country roads and among ugly rustic faces since he left his last gay quarters? He hailed this apparition as an especial kindly interposition of Fortune on his behalf. He was as pleased as the boy greeted from the tedium of a walk to school by the sudden rapture of starring and pursuing a wild rabbit.

Captain Mowbray waited until his troop had passed from under the last elm that shaded the land, and then, turning his horse, he galloped back in the direction of the oak.

CHAPTER XXIV.

WHAT IS THE HARM?

MEN and horses were gone; but the stir of their presence lingered a while in the vacant path. The birds had not recovered their confidence in the lower twigs of their homes; and Azalea's ears were still full of the music of their movement. The last plume had nodded away into the clear sunshine of the high-road ere the girl berthought herself of regaining her flowery and retrieving her fern. She had buried her pretty round arms, the better to preserve her sleeves, and was about to drop down into the soft herbage below, when the sound of horses' hoofs made her pause and tremble.

Was the beautiful dream coming back again? Was she once more to gaze on that scintillating line of gorgeous gold and crimson? She looked down the lane, and, to her surprise, saw not all, only one of the number, coming toward her, making, even by himself, a blaze of color in those cool green shadows. In an instant he was opposite to her. The steed was checked and turned unceremoniously loose. The latter made no attempt at flight, but quietly dropped his head—possibly considered that the luscious depths of dewy grass, while the rider stood motionless, surprised into momentary stillness by the charm of the picture before him.

"A dryad, by Jove!" the Captain remarked, afterward, with hazy reminiscences of his schoolboy studies in Latinity. "Those wild-wood creatures that live always up a tree."

Azalea stood with scared eyes and beating heart, surveying the intruder. She had become aware of something more than a red coat and gleaming helmet. She felt, rather than saw, the big brown eyes that looked down at her face with somewhat of entreaty in their bold fire. In one brief second she divined the fact that she could never forget it—that even in the gray twilight that foreruns death, that face and that tone would be present to her memory.

Captain Mowbray was, as we have said, awed into inaction for an instant by the girl's exceeding grace of form and outline. Then his time being short, and the sounds of his troopers' horses already sounding fainter down the distant highway, he caught hold of a projecting branch, and swinging himself up to Azalea's side, suddenly clasped her close to his breast, swept his brown mustache down in delicate kisses, kissed her mouth twice, and then dropped down as quickly on to the sward below, jumped into his saddle, with the reins in a debonair hand and one foot in the rising his face, and a gay laugh on his red lips.

She had had no time for outcry or remonstrance. She had struck her little hand with all her force against the audacious face that dared to press so near her own. There was no time for one word, or any other sign of her mingled dignity. She struck out her hands from a purely animal instinct of self-defense; but her captor had left her the blow—nay, the pleasant reminder of the kiss which had preceded it. It was as if a poor wood-pigeon was fluttering and pecking at its soft bill against Captain Mowbray's hand.

"I will come again," he called out, as he swept past her. "I'll have another kiss of you, darling, before long."

Still laughing and waving his hands, he was lifted out of sight.

Poor Azalea did not gather up her fallen flowers; they withered away in the dank ditch below; they altered as the fair morning on which they were plucked. She sat down among the dewy boughs, and cried bitterly. A brand of shame seemed to be scorching her lips.

"I can never, never tell daddy or Mr. Doug-las," she thought. Then she rose, stood erect, and looked reproachfully at her cotton dress.

"If I were only better dressed, and sat in a drawing-room like Miss Rose Grey, this would never have happened. I will never look at a soldier again. How dared he to treat me so? I will never forgive him as long as I live. It would have served him rightly if I had killed him."

Her eyes flashed through her tears, and her feet looked capable of a race for the place of vengeance. In her heart she classed the stranger with some of the worst villains among her acquaintances in Craig's Court. She decided that his offense was unpardonable, and with her face dark and stern she retraced her steps toward the house.

A thousand schemes for abasing her enemy flitted through her busy brain as she moved hastily through the paths, the fire in her thoughts lending unconscious impetus to her movements. If he came again, she would pass him with haughty unconcern; but then he might ignore the hanghtiness, and repeat the offense. She would meet him in that blue merino dress her daddy had lately purchased for her, and greet him with a cold bow, and a scornful, averted face; or she would go out with an old-fashioned dagger (she rejected the idea of the garden-knife, which was practically sharper, as being too prosaic an implement of vengeance), and strike him to the heart through all that bulwark of red and gold.

A woman of the world would have made allowances for Captain Mowbray—have taken into consideration his temptation, the dearth of pretty faces between Norwich and Axriel, and, above all, his unavoidable haste, which precluded his waiting to express apology or regret; but Azalea only felt that an enemy had struck a blow at the manly tenderness in which her thoughts had hitherto rested in as sacred security as flowers in a Madonna's shrine. She had been sovereign of undivided empire in Dream-land. The surprising ambition of youth made her ever assume the highest place among those lovely personages she thronged round her in imagination. Practically, too, she was a little queen—the adored of old Moore's failing eyes—the worshipped of his head —the empress of hundreds of living things who fluttered to her at the beck of her finger, and the coo of her soft voice! She had the not unusual to rebel at finding out this morning that she was but an ordinary little mortal who had been picked up and kissed by a strange soldier, and had not got away from that morning hour all day. All the noon was mourning to her. There was ever the gray film of dawn in the air, and the brown eyes pursuing her wherever she turned. They were her secret shame and disgrace. Her cheek flushed and her eyes lowered at the remembrance. Yet when she fell asleep that night she repeated softly to herself, "I shall come again;" and in her voice was a thrill of something which was not all anger.

CHAPTER XXV.

CAPTAIN SWORD VISITS CAPTAIN PEN.

LATE that evening Robert Douglas's solitude was broken in on by the unwonted appearance of a visitor at his cottage door. Visitors, to be judging by his externals, was by no means the description of guest to be expected in such a homely dwelling. From his glossy, closely-curled head to his well-fitting boots, he was a perfect representative of a handsome, high-look-ing Englishman. He was fashionably dressed, but with a fashion that was refined by taste, and there was not a violent or inharmonious color in his whole attire. He moved his cigar from his lips as he stood in the doorway; and called out, in a cheery voice:

"Hollo! old fellow, is that you? What a jolly night is it!"

The voice was familiar, and Douglas found himself confronted by the bright eyes and genial smile of Thurstan Mowbray.

"I have no march," Thurstan explained; "I came past Axriel this morning; but I couldn't come and see you then, as there was no one else with the mare. At the county town I met a relation by a brother officer. As soon as I could, I got into mufti, and leaving him in command, I came to the railway station. I found that I had hours down here so as to spend a couple of hours with you. I was so sold to find you were out. Can you give me something to eat?"

Douglas looked perplexed.

"I do not know how much bread there may be left," he said, smiling. "I have not excellent barrel of Maçon wine sent to me by a friend in the South of France; but as to eating—Stay, I will make you some convent eggs."

"What are they?" Thurstan asked, doubtfully.

"They are better than nothing. You have often said you would make any sacrifice for me, Mowbray, and you have kept your word—you have sacrificed your dinner. What greater proof of devotion can an Englishman give?"

"I didn't sacrifice much," Captain Mowbray admitted, candidly. "The dinner at the town inn are marvels of toughness. I am so glad to see you again, old fellow. You are looking better than you used to do."

"I can not return the compliment," Douglas said, looking up from his culinary occupation. "You are looking more than three years older than when I last saw you."

"I have had many more bottles of wine have incurred four times the number of debts, and have fallen in and out of love so often—of course I am old on a man."

"Which is the worst phase of suffering, the debts or the love affairs?" Douglas asked, smiling.

"Oh, the debts! Women forget, but creditors never do. Women are forgotten; but how can you shake from your mind the sight or necessity of obtaining more things on credit? really think I shall have to change into the Line." And Captain Mowbray looked as Mr. Curtius may have looked as he surveyed the unfathomable horror of the Forum gulf.

"Dinner is served," Douglas announced, gravely, as he placed a steaming savory mess of eggs and herbs on the deal table.

Thurstan was not among Captain Mowbray's faults. He ate heartily of the dish, and then looked gratefully at his host.

"You always were a clever fellow, by Jove!" he said, with profound admiration. "And this wine has a wondrously delicate flavor. Where did you get it from?"

"From Maçon."

"Oh! I remember—the place where the women wear those rummy hats. I have been abroad since I saw you, Douglas. I followed your advice, and went first to Paris."

"And did Paris have a consolatory effect?"

"Well, I certainly felt much better after I had been there a fortnight. As Mlle. C—— said, 'Life is too short for regret, and too long for constancy.' Not but what I would have followed that woman (Lady Di I mean) to the Antipodes if she had beckoned to me with her little finger."

"But she did not beckon?"

"No! she went to Italy and joined the Ormes' party. I believe her intention was to become Lady Orme; but Orme is so obtuse he didn't see it. I don't blame him much, for when he understood her drift unless she had asked him point-blank to marry, and then he'd have said, 'I'll think about it.' There is no victim so difficult to capture as the one who vacillates. She would have missed the mark there from the unsteadiness of the object aimed at."

"And where is she now?"

"Back in England. I have only seen her once since her return."

"And then?"

"She then looked at me with such a sweet, unconscious expression, that she will be deluged me into the belief that there had never been any thing between us. Her mother (a regular Mrs. Proteaux was in attendance; and although I had fancied I had entirely ceased to care for her, I was sufficiently piqued by her coolness to plunge into an ostentatious flirtation with Amelia Orme."

"And what said Lady Diana?"

"She merely smiled to herself. I think she guessed my motives," Thurstan said, gloomily.

"She did indeed. You must have been in a sad plight only to exasperate you," quoted Douglas.

"Yes; I suppose she did it to get a rise out of me," Captain Mowbray, in his ignorance, of the quotation. "But this was nearly two years ago. I should know better how to act indifference now. I have mixed much more with all classes of women, and have learned some of their tricks."

"Your experience does not seem to have increased your respect for the sex," Douglas remarked, dryly.

"Why should it?" the young man said, indifferently. "Virtue is as obsolete as peg-top trousers; innocence is only for fashion, and for years I have no wish to see it revived. It makes life much easier for us, matters being as they are."

"Life might be easier, especially in hot weather, if we all followed the primitive customs of our forefathers, and went about the house in a state of nature, sacrifice to decency than a suit of blue wood," Douglas answered, impatiently. "I wish you wouldn't talk in that way about women, Captain Mowbray: I assure you it is not at all in good taste. Men should never speak ill of their countrywomen disparage the virtues of their race; both are much as we make them."

"Why, you used to be more severe against the sex than any one," the young man said, surprised. "One would think you were in love."

It has been said that Captain Mowbray was shrewd.

"Hush!" Douglas cried, sharply. "Do not talk of love and me together. What has an age embittered by the memories of the past, a ruined face, and an uncouth form, to do with the morning-bloom of youth? I am too tried—too worn with pain and struggle to be capable of the cruel strength of the passion of love. Its heavenly exultation, its hellish despair, would destroy me. My life has of late years been a long agony; but it, at least, has been calm. If I felt my heart's repose troubled, it would be well for me to die."

He spoke with what appeared to be undue energy; his large eyes flashed light from their enormous recesses, and his lips quivered like those of one who is hurt and dreads to show his pain. Captain Mowbray looked at him with as much wonder as a well-bred man permits himself to feel.

"I do not see why you need talk of wrinkles and uncouthness," he said, presently. "You looked like a head of Jupiter Tonans just now when you were excited. There are no end of women who would give you a thousand times better than me."

Douglas shook his head impatiently.

"What has become of Clairveaux?" he asked, by way of changing the conversation.

"Oh! Clairveaux is getting on well, and a considerable portion of his fortune, and all his volition in the care of a wife. Lady Clairveaux is not strictly pretty, but she is clever. She has a French woman's art of making the best of herself and her opportunities. Clairveaux believes her to be a Susanna, while she boasts herself a Bathsheba."

"And De Smith?"

"De Smith is Lady Clairveaux's favored admirer and Clairveaux's most intimate friend. But what a memory you have, Douglas! Fancy your recollecting all that of De Smith!"

"It is one of my misfortunes," Douglas said, "that I can never forget any thing. Memories are sometimes a fitness they hold down our pain round us with cruel tenacity long after the wounds have been dealt. How much happier some of us would be if we might take the kindly draughts from the Lethean river!"

"I don't know where that river may be. I'd go and liquor up there with a shot if I thought it would help me to forget the total of my tailor's bill," Captain Mowbray said, simply. "Oh, Douglas! you can't think how it bores one to be poor."

"You mean how it bores one to seem not to be poor: you young fellows expend so much more on precision than you do on pleasure. If you did not lavish your money in doing what is called the 'right thing' you would have more to spend in real luxury."

"What is your idea of real luxury?"

"You do not think I am likely to be a good judge of what the word means," Douglas said, observing his friend's eyes glancing round the barely-furnished room; "but be sure that no lover of fruit has ever appreciated its beauty as Tantalus did. Twenty years ago I reveled in what I called luxury. I sought for and found the most lovely aspects of Nature. I witnessed, and in some cases possessed, some of man's most perfect handicraft. I had rare paintings on my walls—Magdalens, by Guido, with mellow faces that looked as if they were dropping to sleep in that sunset, amber light; I owned rare gems in warm tresses. I had Cupids, by Rubens, tumbling their fair limbs in deep gorgeous-colored piles of fruit. I delighted in those dear little sensitive, sensual faces by Greuze; and I mortgaged a portion of my future heritage for the sake of a dancing girl by Murillo. I specify these to show you that I revel in color, and that my eyes do not for choice rest on these bare white walls. Every room was adorned by the richest and brilliant, excepting when a butterfly takes it into its wise head to perch there for an instant, furling and unfurling its velvety wings in the warmth of a stray sunbeam. I won't bore you by dilating on the appropriateness of form; but the refined artist who moulds beauty in marble, carving from the uncouth mass dimpling feet and seats to rest upon through the air as they run down—who creates mutable beauty with an immutable substance—who carves tremulous smiles round new-born lips, and produces from the lustreless stone limbs which stir the heart to a quicker pulse with their voluptuous representation of perfect human loveliness—he (were he as divine as even Phidias) could not estimate grace of outline more highly than myself. When I was a lad of eighteen, years ago, I used to spend hours in my father's library—a room full of grave shadows, and formal, sombre-colored furniture. In a niche by the window stood the one grace in the room—an exquisite copy in marble of the Florentine Venus Anadyomene. I can not describe to you the subtle emotion which the contemplation of this crouching lovely creature awoke in me. Her virginal face haunted me in my solitude. I imagined the shell on which she stood floating in tideless seas. I pictured her, with her perfect limbs, rosied by the moving veil of cool waters, her filleted head gleaming like a sparkling star in the blue depths. I would fain have fallen down and kissed the little round feet into the cool stone they wanted—that of living, bleating lovelinoss. I carpeted with reverent hopes the pure modestly crossed ones in front. Her curved wrist, her dimpled, undulating shoulders, her pear-shaped bosom, hair concealed by its shining tresses, inspired me even then with an appreciation, which was almost rapturous in its intensity, of beauty in its highest form. Judge then, Mowbray, whether my eyes are satisfied by the sight of hideous, crook-backed old women who stumble through these lanes on Sunday on their way to seek some afternoon, continual toil, whose faces are rough as those of men, and whose hair is as coarse as that of horses."

Captain Mowbray thought of the girl he had left trembling amidst the ferns on the previous morning, and he hastily decided that his friend was unfortunate in his rural experiences.

"According to your own definition your present mode of living is joyless and utterly unattractive to your senses. How is it that you seem content?" he asked, stifling a yawn with an inhalation of cigar-smoke.

"Pain is sharper than pleasure is sweet," the elder man said, pithily. "I am content to resign the material satisfactions of wealth that I may escape an attendant bitterness which would more than neutralize their enjoyment. I have at least known some great luxury during these latter years of poverty and solitude, which I lacked in the old days when I was in and of the world."

"And that is—?"

"The companionship of a pure and sinless life."

"A woman," Captain Mowbray muttered to himself. "I thought as much. Aloud he said, "Who keeps the old house at Axriel?"

Douglas did not answer for a moment; then he said, slowly, reluctantly, "An old man called Moore, who was, I believe, placed there by your father."

"Oh! is there no one else?"

"Yes, an equally old woman—a cottager, who, as the Essex people say, 'does for him.'"

Captain Mowbray looked disappointed. "I wonder if there is any game hereabouts," he said; "because I might run down for a few days in the autumn, and get a couple of brace of rabbits for knowing so little about the old place I haven't visited it since I was a boy."

"There is a good deal of game on the place," Douglas replied, hastily.

"Well, good-night, dear old fellow!" Thurstan said, suddenly buttoning up his great coat. "I have no end of things to talk to you about; but I haven't time now, as I must get back to the station to see you again later in the year, for Lord Airdale, the Master of the Hounds, is very good friends with me, and always asks me down in the hunting season. We will go over Axriel together some day then. I dare say you already know more about the books and pictures than I do. Good-by."

"I will walk with you to the railway," Douglas said; and the two went together to S——.

As they shook hands at the station Douglas gave his friend a parting counsel.

"This is an awfully bad country for hunting. It is thickly inclosed with new-made fences: the banks are sharp as knives, and not nearly so firm; what grass there is to cut up by marshes. I can not imagine any one who is accustomed to a flying country coming for this creep and crawl —this pitch and toss style of thing."

"What a fellow that is!" Thurstan said to himself, as the train moved out of the station.

"Here I have known him all these years, and never found out before that he had an inkling of what the red hunting meant. I suspect he is an old history. I wonder if he will ever enlighten me as to who he is or was. Not that it matters. His saving my life is quite antecedent enough for me. The country is all he says. I should bolt my fences—Brag and Bramble to Airdale's. They are quite clever enough. What a pretty girl that was! I feel quite sorry to think that by to-morrow night I shall have left her sixty miles behind me. I dare say Amelia Orme will be very glad to see me. And, after all, women are very much alike, only that girl in the hedgerow didn't wear a lump of false hair, and the color didn't come off her cheek when I kissed her; on the contrary, it grew redder. In these respects she is decidedly dissimilar to other women."

MY FIRST PROPOSAL.

At last, the long day's haying done,
I turned to leave the fragrant meadow,
Where, on the grass, the setting sun
Before me cast my lengthened shadow.

I struck a narrow path that ran
By Lovell's farm, a cross-by-two
Which somewhere thereabout began,
And ended on the dusty highway.

It reached their barn-yard first of all,
Then wandered through a wooded hollow,
And darted down an orchard wall,
As if inviting you to follow;

It climbed a hill where all the day
The crows rehearsed a mimic Babel;
It crossed a brook which flowed that way,
Then slid beneath one farm's brown gable.

A shorter cut it was that led
To our own homestead from the meadow,
And so I followed it instead,
And on before me went my shadow.

Then nearing Lovell's farm I heard
The well-known cattle-clarity jowing,
While, bubbling, in the bright pails stirred
The milk from well-filled udders flowing.

I glanced beyond the barn-yard wall,
And there sat Katy milking "Speckle,"
With her fair cheek one among the kine
Her fine coat flecked with many a freckle.

Then up got Katy—so by that
I knew her milking done—and straightway,
While my own step quick quickened pace,
Came toward me through the corn stalks gray.

The sun dropped down from out the sky,
And left the west with rich gold laden;
An awkward country lad was I,
And Katy but a simple maiden.

Her eyes met mine, as if by chance,
Then, observing what I was about shyly,
'Neath drooping lids, withdrew their glance,
Then back again to mine stole slyly.

With that last look my courage fled,
And said—it may have been I swore it—
She was the sweetest girl I knew,
And told her how I loved her for it.

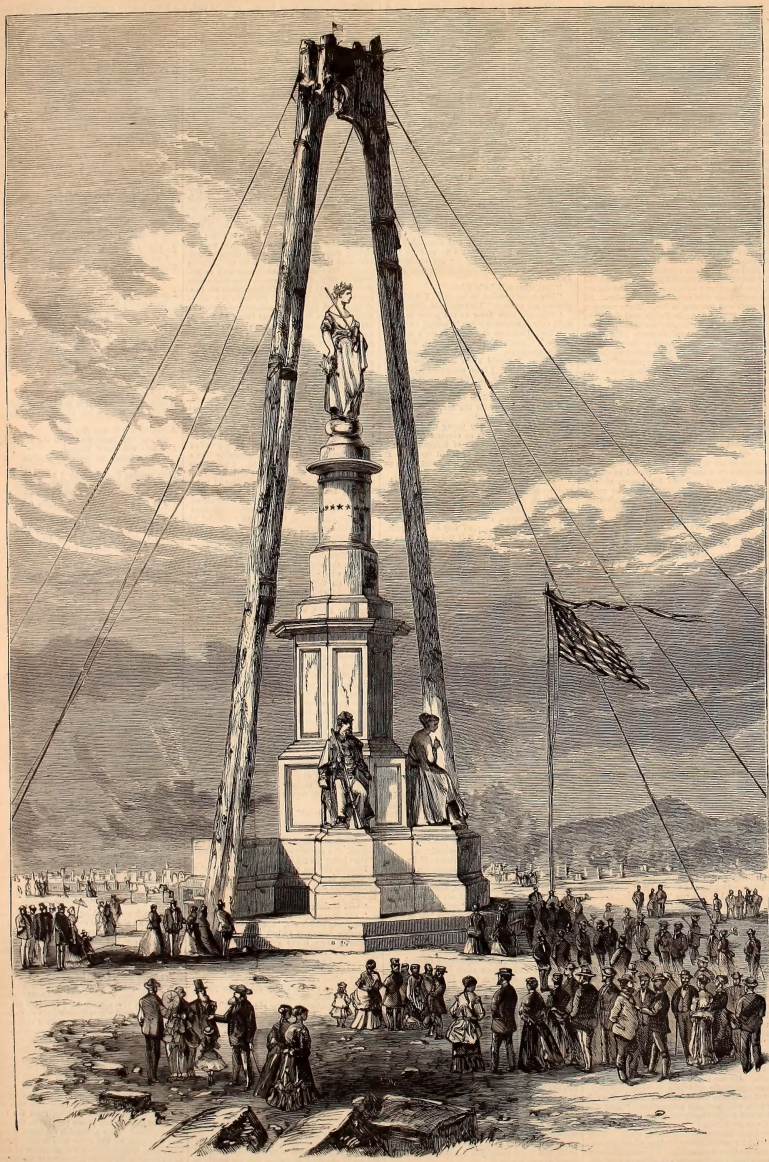
Perhaps she gave me no reply,
Perhaps it was the night's gray curtain,
Slow-falling from the twilight sky,
Which left her answer so uncertain.

Then winding homeward, torn with doubt,
The tree-toads trilled their firm conviction;
The patriarch frogs, with deep bass shout,
Gave hoarse assent and kind benediction.

The katydids pronounced both ways;
But ere the moon was one hour older
I sat beneath its silvery rays
With Katy's head upon my shoulder.

GEOLOGICAL CHANGES.

THERE is no such thing as perfect rest in nature. If no alterations occurred under the ordinary operations of time, it does not require a scientific education to convince any one of common understanding that the hills and dales were once under the sea. On the highest mountain peaks in Syria, between Jerusalem and Damascus, the traveler sees marine shells which belonged to a primitive sea. Even in Europe, on the shifting sands of the Southern States, immense beds and reels of coral show clearly that the sea once covered the regions of dry land where these tokens of geological changes are found. How plain it is that the mighty seas of the earth have once covered gravelly creeps over the land. While gaining in one direction new land is coming into view in another, bringing on its uprising crest the remains of animals and plants peculiar to the watery element! Like a Spanish fandango, while one side goes up the other goes down. Thus every atom entering into the organization of this magnificent globe moves and shares in the never-ending changes which the stability of this and the whole material universe depends.



THE GETTYSBURG MONUMENT, DEDICATED JULY 1, 1869.—PHOT. BY TIPTON AND MYERS, GETTYSBURG.—[SEE PAGE 457.]

GETTYSBURG SPRING.

THE GETTYSBURG MONUMENT.

On the 1st of July the Monument erected by the loyal States to the memory of those who perished on the battle-field of Gettysburg was formally dedicated. It is erected in the cemetery in which the soldiers were buried where they fell. Fifteen thousand people were present at this dedication.

The Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER made the opening prayer. General MEADE made an appropriate speech, recalling the history of the battle. An address was read by Senator O. P. MORTON. He gave an eloquent review of the progress which Freedom has made during the last decade on both continents. He spoke of that 4th of July, 1865, as the most memorable since that of 1776. It was not only a day of victory in the East. "On another field it witnessed the surrender of another large rebel army to the great chieftain of the war, now our illustrious President. The capture of Vicksburg opened the navigation of the Mississippi River, and severed from the Confederacy all that part of its territory lying west of that river. The loss to the Confederacy was irreparable. It was cut off from its chief source of supplies. The limits of the war were greatly circumscribed. The mass of the rebel population was demoralized, and began to despair. From that day it became manifest that the rebellion could not succeed unless the Southern people exhibited that endurance, patience under adversity, and high devotion that will sacrifice every thing for the cause, which, as it turned out, they did not possess. By our victories at Gettysburg and Vicksburg the rebellion lost its prestige in Europe and all hopes of foreign intervention."

"At the foot of this Monument," he continued, "sleep the heroes of the battle. Here lie the father, the husband, the brother, and the only son. In far-off homes, among the hills of New England, on the shores of the lakes, and in the valleys and plains of the West, the widow, the orphan, and the aged parent are weeping for these beloved dead. Many of the tombs are marked "unknown," but they will all be recognized on the morning of the resurrection. The unknown dead left behind them kindred, friends, and breaking hearts. None die so humble but leave some one to mourn. "Perished at Gettysburg, in defence of their country, 979 men, of whose names, homes, or lineage, there is no trace left on earth. Doubtless the Recording Angel had preserved the record, and when the books are opened on the last day their names will be found in letters of living light, on the imperial page of heroes who died that their country might live.

"In the fields before us are the graves of the rebel dead, now sunk to the level of the plain, unmarked, unhonored, and unknown. They were our countrymen, of our blood, language, and history. They displayed a courage worthy of their country and of a better cause, and we may deem it a part of their memory. The news of this fatal field carried agony to thousands of Southern homes, and the wail of despair was heard in the western and orange-groves of the South. Would to God that these men had died for their country, and not its betrayers! Strife for evil is terrible. Oh, who can describe the wickedness of rebellion, or paint the horrors of civil war?"

The monument is sixty feet in height, and consists of a massive pedestal twenty-five feet square at the base, upon which stands a colossal figure representing the Genius of Liberty. Standing upon a three-quarters globe, she holds in her right hand the victor's wreath of laurel, while with her left hand she clasps the shoulder sword through whose uncovered power the victory was gained. Resting from the upright of the pedestal are four buttresses supporting an equal number of allegorical statues, representing respectively War, History, Peace, and Plenty. War is personified by a statue of the American soldier, who, resting from the conflict, relates to History the story of the battle, which on the monument is intended to commemorate. History, in a listening attitude, records, with pen and tablet, the achievements of the field and the names of the honored dead. Peace is symbolized by a statue of the American mechanic in the costume of the agriculturist accompanied by appropriate emblems. Plenty is represented by a female figure with a sheaf of wheat and fruits of the earth, typifying the rich and abundant gift of soldier's returning triumph. The monument was designed by JAMES G. BATTERSON, of Hartford, Connecticut, and the statues are of CARRARA marble, and were executed in Italy.

It is impossible, in connection with this dedication, to forget the 19th of November, 1863, when President LINCOLN, standing upon the battle-field, delivered that short but memorable address, which will forever be associated with the greatest victory of the war. "In a larger sense," he said, "we can not dedicate, we can not consecrate, we can not hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us, that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they here gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this nation shall, under God, have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people and for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

BAYARD TAYLOR, in the opening passage of his poem repeated by him on the occasion of the dedication, happily alludes to this address:

After the eyes that looked, the lips that spake
Here, from the shadows of impending death,
Those words of high resolve,
What voice may fitly break
The silence, that followed, left by him!
We can but bow the head, with eyes grown dim,
And, as a fitful flame, repeat
The phrase his martyrdom hath made complete,
Noble as that, and more surely sweet:
"Let us, the Living, rather dedicate
Ourselves to the unfinished work which they
Thus far advanced so nobly on its way,
And never let the blood-stained banner trail,
Lest we, upon the field where they, the brave,
Fell, should be found wanting in the gift of devotion given,
Highly resolve they have not died in vain!
Then, under God, the People's future birth
Of Freedom, and the People's gain
Of Law and Order, shall endure and never wane
And perish from the circle of the earth."
From such a text the poem, shall hereafter
To light its fated fire,—
And long as men have music turn
Its virtue, simple, sorrowful, and stern!
His voice and his memorial shall be linked:
For, whatever be strain,
We hear but echoes of his own!

"We consecrate ourselves to them, the Consecrated."

THE BATTLE-FIELD.

A correspondent of the Boston Traveller has recently visited the battle-field of Gettysburg, and writes as follows:

On Seminary ridge the trees and fences are shattered and riddled, showing plainly how fierce was the contest where the fight began. Here we found two bullets, one driven into the other so far that they could not be drawn apart. The supposition is that a Union and a rebel sharp-shooter aimed so accurately for each other that they fired at so near the same time that the bullets met, and one being a little more dead-on than the other, carried the one passing from it in the opposite direction. Both fell, of course, to the ground, and thus prevented the death of both of the marksmen, which must have been the result had the bullets met, by grazed shots either.

When we spoke of this eccentric at the hotel a whole army of relic speculators wished to purchase it. Doubtless the sum which we received for it was trebled when sold to the memento seekers who frequent the town. These speculators do a thriving business in the relic line, and have every thing to sell from a thousand shell to the smallest waste of the top-shop, all in some way connected with the battle.

Guns cut from Culp's Hill or Little Round Top are for sale in many dealing-windows, and if the visitor is a little incredulous and inclined to doubt that the same guns can be found in other places, they will point with him, take any sapling he may select, and make it into a cane in a remarkably short space of time. This business has become one of great importance to Gettysburg, and it is proposed to introduce machinery for the manufacture of toys from the battle-field wood.

The traces which are found of the fight along the front of Hancock's and Sedgwick's line—except in the blasted peach orchard—were not very distinct, owing to the growing fields of grain and the rebuilding of barns torn pull to pieces by the shells. But the graves of the rebel dead are there, designated fields for their repose. In one or two places the bodies were sticking out, but generally their graves were covered with earth. In the cemetery the Union dead is neatly and separately buried.

At Little Round Top the rebel dead are still visible on the rocks, while several large datestones with their letters worn and rolled have been picked from the names and the date of their death, "1863," which they have become there as a breast-work is still entire, and the trees have not yet outgrown their wounds.

Our illustrations on pages 456 and 457 are mainly from sketches by THEODORE R. DAVIS.

One of our pictures represents Bloody Run Spring. The curative properties of this spring were first brought prominently into notice in connection with the battle. The soldiers were encamped about it, and their sick drank of its water and experienced relief. Adjoining the battle-ground is the spring we give illustrating representing the Gettysburg Springs Hotel. This hotel is situated on the battle-field, one and one-half miles west of Gettysburg, near the spot where General REYNOLDS fell. This hotel has been built since the middle of December, 1868, by a joint-stock company of the members of the Gettysburg Spring Company and the most prominent citizens of the town. It is a very handsome structure, well appointed, and furnished with all the modern improvements. The scenery about it is of unsurpassed beauty.

MY NAMESAKE AND I.

My name is Murray Menteith, and I wish it wasn't. At least, I don't exactly wish it wasn't, because it is a pretty name, and a good name, and a common name, and, in common people, who are uncertain, or only too certain, about their grandfathers, are not likely to have any name among them as Murray Menteith. My brother's name is Douglas, and even that circumstance, otherwise gratifying, has proved inconvenient to me in connection with the horrid fatality which has pursued and come up with me on several occasions already, and may have to answer for shocks on more that I see yet; so that, while don't exactly wish that Murray Menteith was not my name, and that it had been Douglas, I am sorry I do wish very sincerely that we were the only Murray and Douglas Menteith in the world, or at any rate in this part of it.

Douglas has not been pursued by the above-dedicated fatality, and I had rather not mention the matter to him; for he is very much attached to me, and he has an odious habit of laughing at any thing which he considers a good joke, and unfeeling indifference to the sensations of others, which may be lacerated by the witticism. Perhaps his turn may come, and then he will weep the sympathy of a brother who has not a hitherto regarded rather in the light of a "mate," just because I have a turn for sentiment and he is not ashamed of it, and because I never devote myself to fatiguing bodily exercises, for cruel purposes, which he calls field-sports.

I am stalwart, well-developed, and decidedly well looking, though not precisely what your patrons of prize-fighting, or women who look upon a beard as the moon of the month of manly beauty, would call a "fine man." I am not tall enough to be awkward, nor short enough to be insignificant; and my personal appearance is indicative of intellectual superiority and a thoughtful habit of mind. My brother Douglas, who is a big fellow, given to cultivate his muscles at the expense of his brains, and who indulges heartily in that greed which has been pithily summarized as "fearing God, and walking a thousand miles in a thousand days," is the direct reverse of Menteith, who is the bodily presentment of my "fatality," may be like him; indeed, I have no doubt he is, for no one ever supposed me to be a coarse sort of person, of practical tastes—as it is the fashion to call those horrid energetic people who put themselves into unnecessary perspiration, and make every one else uncomfortable; but he can not possibly resemble me. But that I regard the expression of my features as rather a handsome unobjectionable sense, I should not like to say that a "cursed spite" caused my namesake and his brother, when they were boys together, to arrive at St. Andrews—an institution, as every one in and out of Scotland knows, unrivaled in the world for the cultivation of golf—before my brother and I quitted the classic halls, to whose shelter I look back with affectionate regret. I regret, I say, that I can not look back at all. I never happened to see the gentlemen—our "doubles," as Douglas called them—at all the balls we gave, and I believe, and laughed in his big, obstreperous sort of way over some execrable pun about "doubles" and "trebles," which he took no notice; to rebuke him would be unbecoming, and I endeavor to amend his taste and control his temper. Douglas has frequently remarked, when the similarity of names turned up again in conversation, that it was very fortunate we were not twins, as mistakes could be made, and many mistakes could be made, or stupid, ill-bred, practical jokes attempted. I made the remark somewhat severely—Douglas has a peculiarly unrefined taste for practical joking—and I never gave the subject another thought.

My pursuits are literary—chiefly poetical, with a dash of the philosophical, and a tendency toward the scientific. I am fond of geology, and I may say devoted to philology, and its cognate science ethnology. I am an enthusiastic admirer of Max Müller, Professor Owen, Professor Müller, Captain Grant, and Arminius Vambéry. I should like to go to Central Asia if it were not for the heat, the fatigue, and the necessary hypocrisy with respect to my religious opinions. Douglas and the camels, I never could endure. Douglas has no tastes, as I understand the term; he is a "very fair farmer," according to the barbarous phrase in use in Dumfriesshire, and has the cruel propensities I have before mentioned. So he and I parted company when I left St. Andrews, and I remained some time in Edinburgh, while he sought the secluded scenes and comparative solitude of Lanarkshire, as a place as fat as the Bog of Allen was absurdly named. I shall ever recall that brief period—even though as the poet says, I understood human nature as well that he made a lover talk to his mistress on his "calm light love") beautifully sings,

"Bleak as the blast of December my life may prove,"

for then I reveled in the fresh delights of literary society, and the companionship of persons of my own way of thinking; though perhaps the majority were a little superficial; and I frequently danced with ladies who were only defect was her name. I allude to this frivolous, and indeed fatiguing, amusement thus emphatically because it was in the ball-room I first saw Prince Leo. I could not possibly have enjoyed her society so much as I did; for dance she would, and dance she did, whenever and wherever she had the opportunity, of which there was no scarcity in Edinburgh, during that unusually gay and delightful season. Susan Price was the daughter of a London lawyer, the eldest daughter, report said the prettiest, and she was certainly the most lavishly low with with her mother's sister, Mrs. Sandilands, whose house was one of the pleasantest in Edinburgh, and who decidedly, when occasion arose, was a broad Lowland accent, that she hoped her niece would not "go south" single, but marry and settle among her own kith and kin, Messrs. Price. Susan Price was a very pretty girl when I met her—at a scientific lecture, by-the-way, which gave me a high opinion of her intellect, and laid me open to surprise when I discovered the catholicity of her tastes, and her peculiar predilection for the dancing kind of exercise. She was a lithe young woman, and acknowledge that she is a very pretty girl still; though the dream is ended, the sleeping is awakened, and I know—well, not exactly desolate, but certainly disconcerted. She had bright brown eyes, and bright brown hair, and a bright brown complexion. I think—but no doubt I ought to use some other word to describe it—and her cheeks glowed with a rich color which looked like the very hue of health, and which the east wind itself could not either wither or harden into coarseness or redness. She had a bright brown mole about her altogether, and the whitest teeth—with such a milky, innocent whiteness, though; no suggestion of enamel, or dental preparation about them—and the sauciest smile, to be perfectly modest, and becoming a well-bred lady, I ever saw. I say "lady" because she was a lady, I ever saw, in every sense," as I have seen it beautifully expressed. She was clever enough to understand me perfectly without explanation, absurd equally; indeed, she was much too sensible for any thing of that sort, and recognized the grand truth that a husband's qualities are Gamaliel. She had quite an ardent taste for science, attended all the lectures which abounded just then with exemplary punctuality, and was enthusiastic about the "pioneers of civilization," as she called my favorite travelers, that I began to think whether a solid sculpture was not very dangerous companion of the tropical zone, might not be a possible method of adding éclat to a honey-moon trip. Susan Price was very energetic; I could not avoid seeing that; and, though it jarred upon me a little, I remembered that one energetic person in a household was the author an advantage, and that, at all events, when we were married, she would probably give up dancing.

I have said her name was her sole defect, but I soon ceased to mind it; indeed, I rather liked the idea of changing it for her, especially as I discovered one evening, while the "sides" were blundering through the invariably impracticable and ridiculous quadrille, and looking foolish and miserable in the attempt, that she particularly admired my patronymic. I had been speaking about Scottish names, and all the other formalities which must be encountered before I could call Susan my own, and "Miss Price" no longer, and, though I flatter myself I am not a man who could possibly look or feel ridiculous under any circumstances, I confess I felt anxious that there should be nothing to be considered with becoming dignity, and at the same time with a certain touch of originality befitting my position as a refined scientific man.

We had been talking of the new novels, and the names (and indeed the colors, for "red" was coming into fashion) of the hair of their heroines, and then of Highland and Scotch names in general.

"I like almost all the Macs," said Miss Price, in her decided lively way.

Then I explained to her the significance of the Mac and the O, so puzzling and meaningless to all but the Celtic ear. Her attention wandered, and I was about to further explain the names of the clans and the tartans, and I recalled it by saying, abruptly:

"We are rather proud of our name, Miss Price; do you like it? Time out of mind we have borne the same Christian names, and have always been Douglas and Murray Menteith."

"Murray Menteith," she repeated, softly—"Murray Menteith." I had never thought the name half so pretty as when she thus softly said it so much before. A swift, rosy blush spread itself over her face, and there was a look in her brown eyes I had never seen in them till then. "I do indeed like it; I think it a beautiful name."

What happiness! What a delightful opportunity! What a capital suggestion! It might have been rather commonplace to ask her to accept the name she admired had it come about in any other way, but in this it was exquisitely opportune.

"Ah yes, of course, it was always my luck! The "sides" left off their imbecile capering, the music changed, and we had to begin the fifth figure, danced, too, in the deadly-lively style at present in vogue, in which one is debarred from the brief but familiar familiarity of the "galop and "waltz." When we were at liberty to stand still again Miss Price, whose partner I had been, and made it hopeless to attempt to renew a conversation of which the thread had been broken, plunged into a discussion about the various quadrilles, and the state of a deux temps, or "waltz, ah, don't attempt it," as Douglas called it, not once, which might have been excusable in the youthful indiscretion, but every time he could drag the joke (!) into the conversation. That was my last dance with Susan that night; but I did not mind that much, because I knew I should see her the next day at a "literary tea," where I had promised to read some "selections" from the poets, and I thought, after brief reflection, that such an occasion would be even more suitable than the present. I did not even hint her desire to me, but I followed in her wake, and as she tied the cords of her pretty scarlet cloak in the hall I saw the veil of a paper flutter remarkably like an envelope protruding from what I believe I ought to call the tucker of her dress. This little incident filled me with joy—security I can not say I needed—for I had copied for and sent to her in the afternoon some delightfully appropriate lines on the subject of which I had found in an old annual, and of course they formed the contents of the envelope they seized and honored.

I was not a little provoked to find, when I reached my chambers that night, an urgent letter from Douglas, requesting me to join Glentacket at once on business of importance. He did not mention its nature, but said he would send a gig—a dreadful conveyance which to my mind combines the utmost possible discomfort with the greatest possible risk—to meet me at the nearest railway station at four o'clock the following day. This was a pleasant arrangement, and there was no appeal from it, as he had been careful not to tell me what I was wanted for, and suppose there had been a death in the family, and I had not gone, nobody would believe I had not known it. No, I must go, and go I did, and natural curiosity echoed it; and so I made up my mind, sent an apology and an explanation to Miss Price, and wrote for my own accommodation at the literary tea, and started for Glentacket, where I found Douglas in his usual oppressively jovial health, and intolerably interesting spirits, and my aunt and the girls as uninterestingly well as women who live in the country, dine early, have no pressing troubles, and are left on their minds but tracts and bead-work, are accustomed to be. The business on which Douglas had sent for me so imperatively was a mare that was the sole of a farm, which it appeared he could not effect without my concurrence. I am sure he might have taken it for granted; I neither know nor care any thing about business, so long as I get my rights; and to do Douglas justice he always sure of getting them, in any matter in which he is equally concerned. The business had one recommendation—it was over; and I did recommend it return to Edinburgh on the next day but one, and had before me the delightful prospect of meeting Miss Price at one of the most delightful of conchological science; an occasion upon which I thought it probable she might be induced to consent to regard me with interest and attention. With my poetical temperament I am naturally a great smoker, and I am also accustomed to dilate upon the monolithic heavens, free from the vulgarizing obstructions of domestic architecture. The indulgence of these tastes in combination with the pleasures of my stay at Glentacket (the first was wet, as usual), led to my strolling unsuspectingly along the terrace in front of the house, and, after a short whiff of steps, one of Douglas's horrid "improvements"—really, his restless activity of mind is matter of no importance—and more and more offensive—and finding myself struggling in the mud of an artificial pool, with an insidious and ineffective little fountain in the middle of it, against which I cut both my shins severely.

I caught a very bad cold, I was confined to my bed four days, I drank enough toast-and-water to float a frigate of three decks, and I planned a number of schemes for making it, when the time should come, duly effective and elegant. I pined for the companionship of her dear to the longest days of absence. Had she danced as much as usual, while I was unable to move, except in a kind of hop at once painful and ungraceful? Perhaps to her also the hours had been "leadenfooted," and she had found no solace in society and conversation, and consequently with her own heart and been still? had she read the verses and wept over them? had she, perchance, taken the trouble to learn them by heart? Delightful thought! for though I must needs undervalue her, the tender, woeful wailings of my pathetic muse would marvelously tend to attune her heart to all the softer emotions. I wearied for some news of her, and I almost cursed the instinct to which I was condemned, and the absurd process of wet-rag and oil-silk bandages, and weak-tea and dry-toast diet to which I was subjected.

At length news of her came in a most unexpected manner—no other than a letter from herself—which my sister Lucinda handed to me with a grave expression of curiosity becoming a young person of serious tendencies.

"Is that pink paper the fashion among weddings, Murray?" she asked. (I suppose there's a particular kind of stationery for this "conversed.") "Your correspondent writes rather a careless hand; and I can't say I admire the style."

I did not know the hand (it was big and spluttering—a willful, wayward kind of scribbling—but emphatic, I thought afterward, and nice in its way), and I looked close at it and the seal. It bore a well-cut impression of a Cupid, in the customary full undress, carrying a lantern, his finger on his lip, and the legend was "Hush, hush!" I did not read the letter until Lucinda had left the room, which she did tossing her head with virtuous and pious indignation, and, I have no doubt, entertaining the gravest suspicions of my correspondence. These are the feelings when the following lines met my enraptured gaze:

"PRINCES STREET, Tuesday.

"MY DEAREST MURRAY,—As I have not yet heard your present address, and I can't put off writing to you on the chance of a letter which may not come for two or three days—it's well you explained that business engages you, Sir, or I wouldn't bear your silence patiently—I send this to St. Andrews, always, I suppose, a safe address. You will be savage when you hear that all our plans are knocked on the head; and now, after all your anxiety to get to Edinburgh, and all the impatience at the delay—you will not find me there. Papa has written to Mrs. S. to say I must return to London at once, though Julia is to be married for three weeks more, because that horrid old nuisance, Dr. Tuthill, is going up to London on Friday, and papa will have me go with him, to prevent my being left alone, or his having the trouble of coming for me; indeed, he couldn't do that because of business. Now, isn't that horrid? I can't get through all our troubles back; but that depends on many things; and I think it would be better for you to come up to London at once, and let us talk papa and mamma will be softened by Julia's wedding; and I think we may depend on mamma, when we tell her, to worry him out of one thing, at least, and never feel a doubt—I mean of my constancy. We may be parted by the sullen will of others, or eccentric custom, by our own remorseless destiny, by any thing short of death—but in vain; I shall ever remain your own

"SUSAN."

My own Susan! Enchanting, heavenly, delicious; hasty, sparkling. There was no address directed to St. Andrews, and forwarded to me at Glenucket; there was the signature; there was the delightful assurance. My own Susan! But who was Julia? She must suppose me far more familiar with her family and their concerns than I really was: she must have intended that I tell me several things and left her intention unfulfilled; and yet "My dearest Murray," and "Your own Susan," and the whole tone of the letter, was comfortably engaged tone, the perfectly unembarrassed sentences? Had I proposed to her, and forgotten it? Had I proposed to her in a fit of somnambulism, or in a "spiritual trance"? I didn't believe in spiritualism, and openly scoffed at it—but others had taken it the more easily for me? It was dreadfully puzzling, and every moment's reflection decreased my first astonished pleasure. There was the delightful initial endearment, where was the poetical emotion now? Really, Miss Price had wonderful quickness of comprehension if she had taken in half the marvelous celerity, for I could not distinctly remember having ever given her one. And then beginning to feel very comfortable indeed, when I happened to turn over the sheet of paper on which the letter was written, and then I sat bolt upright, marvelled on the other side. Remembering the proverbial value of such an addendum, I read it rather eagerly:

"I must spare a minute, darling, to tell you how good I think you for not objecting to my dancing. I really am fond of it for its own sake, and I don't care a bit for my partner, whoever he may be. And then, I have always your last letter next my heart, which dances too, and I think of you all the time. There's a queer little man I must meet every where, and I really like dancing with him. You'll laugh when I tell you why—because he has nice little feet, and never tears my dress; because he is so very sentimantic and conceited that he goes on talking forever about himself, and the books he reads, and the things he likes, so that one need scarcely talk at all, and I can think of you without being interrupted; and last, and most of all, because his name is—Murray Meintosh."

An explanatory postscript with a vengeance. I pass over my feelings in silence. Poor girl! She had indeed chosen the wrong casket; but I could not aid her now. How happy, how interrogational, how refined a life might have been here. I proceed to my actions. To write upon the letter, "Opened by, but not for me, Murray Meintosh," to hand it to the postman, and abandon it to the dreary vicissitudes of official destiny, would have been the simplest course. To have inclosed it in an indignant letter to the misguided Susan, and sent a copy to her papa, warning him that the wife of his bosom was about to "marry" him, would have been the course adopted by mere vulgar vindictiveness. I trust I am not vindictive; I know I am incapable of vulgarity. Noblesse oblige, and I am confident that even the other Murray Meintosh is a gentleman. I placed the letter in a large envelope, I sealed it with the imposing armorial seal of the Meintoshs, I addressed it to "Murray Meintosh, Esq., St. Andrews," it absent, to await arrival.

As I had promised to keep Susan Price there and then, a resolution to which circumstances have not permitted me to adhere.

I have already said, "fatality." Can I do less when at least a dozen letters of congratulation addressed to the other Murray Meintosh, on the occasion of his marriage with the amiable girl, reached me instead? Is it less a "fatality" that I am constantly called on my state matrimonial, as that people not knowing me intimately, introduction to my wife; that I am subjected to constant personal trouble in sending back parcels that don't belong to me, belong to Mrs. Miss Price's husband; and that I have good reason to believe much missing property of mine is at this moment in Susan Price's? Lastly, is it any thing less than a fatality that the scientific and literary world—the world of taste, my world, in short—should always manifest extraordinary mistakes, of which he invariably reaps the benefit, between my namesake and me?

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

GEORGIA, a remarkably pretty village in the township of Kirkland, nine miles south of Utica, is invaded by that pleasant literary atmosphere which makes the seat of a popular institution delightful. And now, at this season, when College Commencements are occurring in all parts of the country, Hamilton College is a point of interest in many home circles, and demands a share of public attention. This year Commencement at Hamilton takes place next week, on Thursday, July 15, various other exercises connected therewith occupying several previous days. The Senior Class, which graduates, is remarkable for a good reputation for scholarly ability, and one of its members is to be a Phi Beta Kappa orator this year by previous graduate.

The College buildings are situated on an elevation about a mile from the village—a location which affords the students abundance of exercise, as many of them board in the village. The Commencement exhibitory contains a valuable telescope and other instruments. Since 1861 eight asteroids have been there first discovered—at least one every year. Of late years the enthusiasm of this department is well sustained. Hon. William Curtis Noyes, of New York city, who died a few years ago, bequeathed his valuable Law library, consisting of about five thousand volumes, to Hamilton College. Also, Mr. Noyes left a fund that no choice a collection of books should not have been located in a room over a recitation room, a serious number of professional men could have had access to it, yet the Hamilton students live thus afforded unusual advantages. A handsome Gothic library edifice, nearly completed, which will furnish a place for about sixty thousand volumes. The new library rooms, spacious and tastefully laid out, a great variety of tables and stands adding beauty to "College Hill," as it is called, in addition to the fine view which the city of Utica is obtained from this point.

In addition to Hamilton College, Clinton contains several literary institutions of well-known merit. Houghton Female Seminary bears a good repute, as does the Clinton Liberal Institute, a male and a female department. About fifteen young girls from select schools recently graduated at Young Cottage Home Seminary; and the Rural High School, under the charge of Professor A. P. Kelsey, provides a pleasant home for students, with careful training and thorough preparation for college or for business. Among the various literary societies which exist in Clinton as in many other places, is one worthy of imitation. The "Irving Pumpkin Club," composed of staff officers of the militia, not only hold their regular meetings for social discussion, but subscribe to a large number of papers, and get Knight's American periodicals, which are circulated among the members, thus giving to each, at comparatively little expense, a large variety of reading.

It is stated that a year ago Mr. David A. Wells was the author of what has proved to be a remarkable statement. It was a report to Congress, showing that the Government receipts for the year would be $356,000,000, and the expenditures $300,000,000. It now turns out that the receipts have been, in round numbers, $360,000,000, and the expenditures $325,000,000. This is an exact reversal of the figures.

A late writer on Woman Suffrage says that the reform proposed by the most progressive advocates of this movement is "an attempt to make trumpets out of flutes, and sun-flowers out of violets!"

The Prince of Wales has just laid the first stone of a new asylum for idiots. The Independent remarks "there is something rather appropriate about that performance!"

At New Hampton, England, some houses, designed for laborers, have been built in a novel style. Straw is compressed into slabs, about two feet square and six inches thick, under them fire-proof, both sides coated with a kind of cement, and of these slabs the cottages are built. By ingenious contrivances the capacity of Boiser's work is much reduced, and the chimney is so constructed as to secure warmth with the smallest consumption of fuel, and at the same time to heat a drying-closet. The cost of a single cottage of this description, combining "all the requirements of health, decency, and comfort," is £85.

There are one hundred and forty competitives employed in the various types of the London Times, sixty by day and seventy at night: while eleven foremen and assistants direct their movements. Twenty-four persons are required to read proofs, and three are employed merely to "pull" the proofs.

At outside accompaniment of the Peace Jubilee was a baby-show. A reporter remarked: "On entering Tremont Temple you hear a sound as of the articulate voice of Jove! for there are several many times and at once, interspersed with voices as of chuckling and laughter. That is only kissing the babies—there hundred, they say; and you may as well believe it, for you can't count that wriggling, multitudinous mass of young humanity. There are babies fat and babies slender; fair, rosy, dark, and actually apoplectic in color; pimply and scaly, placid and irritable, and cross. There are twins, with projecting foreheads and very curly hair. There is the one-pound baby, done up in a dozen thicknesses of flannel, and the forty-pounder, rumpsaut and overflowing his low-necked dress in folds and ripples of too abundant flesh."

A painful catastrophe is recorded of a beautiful New York damsel, who had all the charms of maidenhood, excepting—she had black hair! Vanity and Nibbel had taught her that blonde would be more attractive—and that golden wig must cost one hundred dollars, she paid in advance. One side of the turbulent dark hair was smoothed into golden ripples, when the hairdresser, to increase his profit, resorted to inferior drugs. The effect was disastrous. Purple, and streaked, and gory, and burned, and, indeed, utterly ruinous was the last half of the professor's work. There remained for the broken-hearted soul-blonde only the poor consolation of suing for damages.

The following curious announcement lately appeared in a French paper: "M. Bernadotte, cousin to the King of Sweden, and dyer at Sorcenes, presents himself as an independent and liberal candidate in the Côte-d'Or. He will meet the electors on Sunday, and will take place at Combevoie, in the public house of M. Burdelle, who is heir to the Turbide, sometime Emperor of Mexico."

The Atlanta (Georgia) University is now being erected upon one of the most commanding sites of that city. This institution will give the advantages of a thorough education to all classes without distinction of race, color, or sex. A normal class of about forty promising pupils, gathered from various parts of the State, has already been formed.

An exchange remarks that many a man keeps himself poor by indulging in two glasses of ale a day at ten; cents each, seventy-three dollars; three cigars, at seven cents each, one dollar and fifty cents; total for a big day, thirty dollars; in all, two hundred and twelve dollars and fifty cents—sufficient to buy six barrels of flour, one barrel of sugar, one sack of coffee, a good cent, a respectable dress, a frock for the baby, and half a dozen pairs of shoes.

According to Chambert's Journal, MESSRS. BLACK-wood, the publishers, paid George Eliot (MRS. LEWES) $10,000 for "Middlemarch," $9,000 for "The Mill on the Floss," and $40,000 for "Romola."

A somewhat inexperienced merchant in West Troy received a good-sized box from an expressman. "What do them ere letters mean?" said he, pointing to the "C. O. D." on the corner. "Them means pay," exclaimed the emphatic expressman. "Them don't spell pay," rejoined the other. "You go along; this ere box is paid for, I know." "I tell you what," returned the expressman, the bright thought almost knocking him off the wagon seat, "them ere letters mean 'Come Ommodiately Down,'" at which conclusive suggestion the man paid for the box, and the happy expressman went back over the river with a new idea in his head.

An Illinois paper is edited by a certain Mr. Steele. A man leaving the neighborhood of Doolittle desired to go into partnership with him. The proposition was declined on the ground that the firm would read backward—Steel and Do Little, or Do Little and Steel. What's in a name!

Many farmers are easily puzzled to know what methods to adopt to keep the bugs from melon and cucumber vines. The following preventive was recently communicated to the New York Farmers' Club by a gentleman of Forest Grove, New Jersey: "The safest and surest remedy is fresh charcoal, pulverized. Dust it on the hill when the seed is put in, and again when the plants come up. It washed off by rain repeat the process. Plants that repair are perfectly safe, and even when covered with bugs they will often disappear on the first application." Another remedy is to saturate corn-cobs with coal-tar, and place them in the hill, near the vine, but not touching it, and it is said the bugs will soon disappear.

RUMORS OF THE DAY.

GEORGE. "I was sorry to hear that you had broken your arm. I suppose it pained you awfully, didn't it?"

FRANK (with much fortitude). "It wasn't the pain, old fellow—it was the feeling deprived of carrying my hands in my pockets which broke me down."

FEMININE TACT.

MAMMA. "Sydney, I insist on your eating that piece of bread. You don't know how hard he worked to fit you out with it."

SYDNEY. "It's so big, ma."

SIDNEY. "But if you fold it up it won't look so big."

"Jim" has a precocious nephew, a lad just three years old. Playing with his kitten yesterday, Miss Kitten "got her back up" about something (kittens as well as folks often get their backs up), and scampered over the floor. Little nephew was delighted, and sang out, "Look, ma, Kitten's got 's Grecian bend!"

Rule 5.—Lunch at a restaurant on baker's bread, sugar pastries, and mince-pie.

Rule 6.—Do all your business in a hurry.

Rule 7.—Rest in hurry dinner at six o'clock of all sorts of indigestible compounds.

Rule 8.—Go to bed late, forget these directions, and it will be easy to be miserable.

A member of the Louisiana Legislature, who carries a pair of gigantic feet, which he stings about as he walks like a pair of flails, recently accosted a well-known member of the bar with, "Mr. Morrison, you know me, don't you?" M——, surprised at the question, drew himself up to full length, and scanning his interlocutor from head to foot, remarked, "Well, Sir, your face is familiar to me, but assuredly your feet have outgrown my recollection."

ANKLES.

There's magic in a lady's foot,
And well it knows where it;
And she who has a pretty one
Is pretty sure to show it.
At times you, too, are martyred by
The nicest little ankle,
That shoots an arrow through your eye,
Within your heart to rankle.

But when it trips along the street,
Through mud, and wet, and vapor,
By discreet accident you see
How beautiful the paper
And as it steps upon the walk,
Amid the crowd it goes by,
Two roguish eyes look up and say,
"I wonder if he's single."

Little Johnny was being catechised by his brother, who wished to know what he was made of. Johnny replied, "You and me and papa are made of dust, and mamma and sister are made of angel's hair."

A poor old woman having been removed to the alms-house was very importunate to have an article of household furniture sent to her behind. Her increasing request was at length complied with, and sent were dispatched to transfer her household property to her new abode. Imagine their surprise, on arriving at her former residence, when they found nothing but a coffin, which, however, they forthwith brought to the old woman, much to her joy and satisfaction, who pleasantly observed she found it very handy to keep her potatoes in.

Heinrich Heine said: "How fortunate the Romans were that they had not to learn Latin grammar! Because, if they had, I suppose we, they could never have found time to conquer the world."

An irregular apprentice, frequently keeping late hours, his master, in order to check the evasion by some weighty arguments to convince him of the error of his conduct. During the chastisement the boy earnestly exclaimed: "How long will you serve the devil?" The boy replied, whimpering, "You know best, Sir; I believe my indentures will be out in three months."

At a recent Sabbath-school concert, in a suburban church, the ordinance of baptism was administered. The clergyman in charge expressed gratification that on occasion offered him so good an opportunity to explain to the children the nature of the service. By way of illustration, he said: "In Old Testament times blood was offered as an atoning sacrifice; hence it was spoken of as a purifier; but what is used as an emblem of purity nowadays—what element conveys the idea of purity?" A moment's silence ensued, and then a dozen little voices squeaked out, "Soap!"

"Boys, what is all this noise in school?"
"It's Bill Stiver imitating a printing-press."
"Come up here, William: if you have turned into a locomotive, it is time you were switched off."

FROM GRAVE TO GAY.

"Every man his own tombstone" would seem to be the motto of the ingenious Grenoble man mentioned in the following paragraph:

An old discovery has just been made by a man of Grenoble, by the name of Bonnet, who has published a pamphlet on the subject. He has found out that the old method of writing is plumped into a shovel invented by the man of Grenoble, and in about five years the original is turned into coal. The process of the operation is known only to the discoverer. He says that in a thousand years' time, if perchance all else perishes and our friends, dog and wife have all vanished with them.

It will then be in any man's power to be the foundation of a noble house. We fear, however, it will tempt the ambitious who have little respect for the living, to cloak their deceased relatives.

SPIRITUAL PHOTOGRAPHY.

INQUIRING SPIRITUALIST. "Do you ever take spirits here?"

FACETIOUS ARTIST. "Oh, certainly."

INQUIRING SPIRITUALIST. "How do you generally take them?"

FACETIOUS ARTIST. "Sometimes with a little sugar, but generally straight."

"Hallo, Jake, where did you buy those fish?"
"I didn't buy 'em."
"Well, where did you get them?"
"I hooked them."

DISTURBANCES IN PARIS—CAVALRY CLEARING THE BOULEVARDS ON THE NIGHT OF JUNE 10.

THE DISTURBANCES IN PARIS.

THE elections in France have been attended with unusual turbulence in Paris and in some other of the more populous cities. That is, there have been street riots, repeated for successive nights. The Government could not regard these disturbances as insignificant, following, as they have, a general election in which the Opposition has polled not far from half the votes of all adult Frenchmen. The Emperor, when he heard the result of the elections, is reported to have said: "Well, at last we are face to face with the revolution, and I know how to deal with it!" Still there has really been no revolution.

To put down these disturbances the authorities of Paris employed the civil force until it was overtasked, when they gave it an impregnable military base, upon which the sergents de ville might retreat in case of need, and whence they might issue, as a cloud of skirmishers, to effect arrests. The cavalry swept the people out of the most crowded of the boulevards and streets, but without using their weapons. The consequence was that every body who shrank from a fresh revolution, but whose restless curiosity had impelled him to mingle with the multitude, took heart to encourage law and order by acclamations of loyalty and active assistance. The cuirassiers, as they patrolled the streets, were greeted with cheers; and cries of "Down with the rioters!" succeeded those of "Down with the Empire!"

The Paris correspondent of the London Daily News says that, had the sergents de ville allowed the natural effervescence resulting from the election to find vent in a few cries, all Paris would have gone quietly to bed by one o'clock. Instead of this they continually charged the utterly inoffensive crowds on the Boulevards, knocked over the people who were sitting outside the cafés, and showed no consideration for women and children. The Temps says that the courtyard in which its office and that of the Reppel and France are situated, having attracted a large number of persons, drawn there by a very natural curiosity, was suddenly invaded by a swarm of police agents, though the place was private property, and every body was turned out with extreme brutality. An old man was knocked down, it adds, by one of these "rioters in uniform," and narrowly escaped being crushed to death under the wheels of a cart.

The riots continued during the week commencing June 6. On the night of the 9th it is estimated that about 20,000 persons were assembled in the streets. The last illustration assembled in the streets. The last illustration assembled 461 regiments of the cavalry clearing the Boulevards on the night of the 10th. Five hundred arrests were made. One has advices from Paris to report the arrest of M. HENRI ROCHEFORT, of La Lanterne notoriety, and who has been most active in exciting popular tumult.

On the 11th order was so far restored that the Emperor and Empress drove in an open carriage along the entire line of the Boulevards without a escort of any kind. So much may be accomplished by force. But how long?

"THE ARAB STORY-TELLER."

IT is needless to say that the art of more or less fictitious narration is a very where cultivated throughout the East, and among the allied nations of the northern coast of Africa. The traditions of the northern coast of Africa. In Southern Italy and Spain the improvisatore may not unfrequently be heard declaiming to an excited audience. In Spain at least this should be a recent thing of the past. Mr. Stoddard in his book on the Moors of Morocco, has described the style of the Christ in St. Francis's Church to be covered with bloody sweat as a mark of His unprofitable pass by with unregarding eyes every day of our lives. How Lord Bacon would have rejoiced to see such a ground result as that above alluded to, of which the basis was the observation and recording of this minute phenomenon by the German optician!

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

I HAVE used my WHEELER & WILSON Sewing Machine eleven years for all sorts of family sewing, from the very coarsest—even carpet-binding—to the finest worn by women, and have quilting. No 300 cotton. It gives me still entire satisfaction, and I can not too highly recommend it to others as a family comfort. Solely from my appreciation of your machine above all others, I have made it a means of selling more than a hundred of them. MRS. C. SLAUGHTER.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS.

They remove all bad accumulations from the bowels, and purify and invigorate the system. All whose health is not perfect owe it to themselves to take a few doses of Brandreth's Pills, because the seeds of decay are constantly eradicated by their use, and the principle of life confirmed, thus giving a vigor of body and mind to a period when we have been used to see the faltering step and the enfeebled intellect.

General Paez, the distinguished liberator of Venezuela, says that he has used them as his only medicine for thirty years, with the most satisfactory results.

For Costiveness, Dyspepsia, and as a Family Medicine, they are unrivaled.

Daniel I. Tenney, Esq., Astor House, New York, cured by Brandreth's Pills of Dyspepsia and Costiveness when all other means used had failed.

A gentleman, whose father died of consumption at 56 years, was also attacked, when about 21, by the disease. He had cough, night-sweats, and general debility. Doctors recommended cod-liver oil, but he wanted away. At last he determined to use Brandreth's Pills. In two months they made him a sound man.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT, PHILADELPHIA.

THE subjoined cut represents the Washington Monument recently erected in front of Independence Hall, Philadelphia. This statue of WASHINGTON was secured through the liberality of the public school children of that city, and the ceremonies incident to the presentation took place July 5. Upon the unveiling of the statue a salute was fired from Independence Square. The principal features of the ceremony were, a prayer by Bishop SIMPSON, an address by HON. HENRY D. MOORE, and another by GEORGE F. GORDON, presenting the statue to the city. Mayor FOX also delivered an address. A large number of the school-children were present.

THE FRENCH-AMERICAN TELEGRAPH CABLE.

BEFORE this reaches the eyes of our readers the French-American Atlantic Telegraph Cable will probably have been laid from Brest to the Island of St. Pierre. This line starts at a point near Cape Ushant and a few miles from Brest. It starts in very shallow water—not more than six, eight, or ten fathoms deep for the first two or three miles, when it slowly deepens from thirty to sixty and ninety fathoms, a depth which is maintained over the whole bed of the English Channel. At this level it continues till in a line with the westernmost part of the Irish coast, when the water quickly deepens from 200 to 800 fathoms. The line, after leaving Brest, takes rather a northerly course, so as to pass just north and within a short distance of three tremendous grim-looking rocks, round which the Atlantic heaves and boils incessantly. These black pinnacles are called the Three Chimneys, and, as far as is known, the foot of man has never yet been on them, only the stormy petrels and the wilder kind of gulls nestling in their caves and niches. They stand in about lat. 47° N., long. 20° W., and the water round them shoals to about 1800 fathoms. A little south of these rocks it sinuls to 1100 fathoms, and about a degree south to less than 500. The cable course, however, is kept in a pretty regular depth of from 1800 to 2000 fathoms, and throughout over a soft bed of shells and ooze. The shells comprise the most minute forms of the dissemination, which are only visible under a powerful microscope, and are as small as the finest dust. The whole bed of the Atlantic seems more or less composed of the debris of these small animalculæ. After passing the Three Chimneys the line will be laid across mid-ocean to near the solitary Job Rock, which rises from deep water in lat. 45° 50′ N., long. 35° 50′ W. It passes a long way north of the Milne Bank, where the bottom of the Atlantic is very irregular, and then curves up to the southern end of Newfoundland, not far west of Cape Race. Here it skirts the south shore of the island for a short length, lying in as little as 100 fathoms water. It soon, however, deepens to 1500 fathoms as it turns due north between the banks called the Green Bank and the St. Pierre Bank. Passing between these it is landed on the French island of St. Pierre, not far from Placentia Bay, Newfoundland. From St. Pierre, where there is to be a station similar to that at Heart's Content, the line will be continued south in moderately shallow water, of from 200 to 300 fathoms, past Cape Breton, the coast of Nova Scotia, Cape Sable, and south of the Brown Bank to Cape Cod, and from a little beyond that to the neighborhood of Plymouth, a small town on the coast of Massachusetts, which is famous in the world's history as the landing-place of the first colonists of New England, the Pilgrim Fathers of Puritan New England, in the time of CHARLES I.

The total length of the cable required for this route will be less than 2000 nautical miles, or very nearly double the length of either of our Atlantic cables. One length of 2788 knots will be required from Brest to St. Pierre, and 776 from St. Pierre to Massachusetts. The distance between Valentia and Heart's Content is, in a straight line, only 1670 nautical miles, but for the cables 2400 miles had always to be made, to allow for slack and in case of accidents. In the cable of 1865 only 1800 miles have been used, and in the cable of 1866 only 1851 miles. The French Company, therefore, has made every allowance for slack and whatever unforeseen accidents in cable laying may occur.

A WAR PARTY.

IS there a war party, or is there likely to be a war party, in the country? This is a question which is always timely under certain circumstances, and which may very properly be asked just now. Abstractly no intelligent and industrious community desires war, and war is very seldom distinctly foreseen. How many people in England supposed there was to be a Crimean war until it came? How many Americans believed on the 4th of March, 1861, that we were on the brink, on the eve of the most war of the rebellion? Every body has a theory that every thing will be settled. Nations, we are told, never fight if they can help it. How John Bull has been laughed at within the last three months for supposing that we meant to fight about the Alabama! Fight? Why, bless his old heart! As we were never so near it in our lives—only he must pay for the Alabama.

In reading the English political and popular history at the beginning of the century, nothing is more evident than the latent hostility to France and Frenchmen, upon which demagogues, and even statesmen, drew at pleasure for their own purposes. And the supply never failed. Popery and wooden shoes was the ridiculous cry of a spirit that was very far from ridiculous, and which produced the most deplorable results. Hostility of this kind is the most convenient resource of unprincipled politicians. They have persuaded that there is no such thing as moral principle in politics, and that every thing is possible to audacity and persistence. Appeals to mean jealousy and inflammatory misrepresentation as confidently as a chemist upon his elements and combinations. The greatest events in history are interpreted by them upon the basest theories. GRACCHUS was an ambitious and selfish schemer; FOX and HAMPDEN and the Parliament unscrupulous tongues and hypocritical centaurs. Our own Revolution was the work of a handful of pernicious lawyers who wanted distinction. The rebellion was dismount cut dismount. Any one who accuses of this kind opposes a President as the arch criminal of history; denounces him as the destroyer of the lives and liberties of the most defenseless people, and the probable accomplice of an assassin the next day they are bowing to him, and pleasantly taking his hand.

This is the spirit in politics that hesitates at nothing, and it is to the extent and influence of this spirit that we must look in answering the question we originally proposed. There is unquestionably a deeply seated hostility to England in this country, and there is an entire lull in domestic politics. The Democratic party is burning to recover power—the Republican party is resolved to retain it. The "Irish vote" is a unit in opposition to England. This vote is controlled by the Democratic party, but there are Republican leaders who are always hoping and scheming to gain possession of it. No bid for this vote could be so resistless as a declared policy of war with England upon a good pretense. But this is as well understood by those who now control it, and who would not shrink at any step necessary to retain it. Meanwhile the American sentiment in regard to the Alabama is virtually unanimous—save in the details, not upon every position taken by MR. SUMNER, but upon the essential point that the escape of the Alabama was a "scandal and a reproach," and the result of an unfriendly feeling.

Under these circumstances, is it unlikely that politicians of the kind we have described, by no means wanting in shrewdness, believe that the party which first appears as a war party with England, upon a fair pretext, will carry the country? The debt is not a considerable one in the case. The argument for war is always an appeal to passion, to prejudice, to emotion of various kinds, and to sweep away all dispassionate consideration. In this case, too, the rebel and repudiating influence would all be for war; nor must we omit the force of the jubilant confidence in our own strength which springs from the experience of the last few years. The domestic political situation of the country, in its various aspects, and the kind of feeling elsewhere in the Alabama difficulty, suggest, therefore, the strong probability that some favorable pretext for a war policy will be sought by certain party managers.

What is it likely to be? Certainly not a haughty ultimatum upon the Alabama question. But are there not other points which may be found to interfere with Great Britain? Has the fishery difficulty ever been settled? Yankee fishermen may take fish within a certain distance of the British American coasts, but it is not yet determined to our satisfaction that the line ran across from headland to headland in the Bay of Fundy? Will the British authorities continue to insist upon it, and should insist upon their right to a certain fishing ground; how if they should disregard a warning to quit; how if they should be attacked, fired upon, killed? Yankee fishing smack sunk by British guns in the Bay of Fundy would, under the circumstances, make war with England very probable. Now the fishermen of Cape Ann are the General BUTLER'S constituents. In his speech at Gloucester, over the graves of the soldiers, he declared that the mission of the Union soldier was to keep alive the flame of hatred to England. He has, indeed, openly announced his favorite method, a peremptory demand of settlement of the Alabama claims, with a menace, in case of refusal, of intercourse, with consequent civil war in England. But statesmen can not always put their naval policy into practice, and are sometimes obliged to seek results in less heroic ways. We do not mean to insinuate that the ESSEX reprehensive is now issuing instructions to the Gloucester fishermen, but the prominence of the fishery question merely as an illustration of the kind of opportunity that can always be improved. But General BUTLER has an undoubted influence in Congress. He is a shrewd and resolute party manager. Does any body doubt that he will strenuously cultivate a belligerent feeling toward England as a sagacious party policy?

We trust that there will be found in Congress a party of statesmen who will treat this subject as honorable men, and not merely as American partisans; who understand that the most patriotic American is he who endeavors to see how all difficulty may be avoided, not facilitated; who heartily despise the eternal cavilling and bragging and bectoring and pandering to illfeeling, which are so foolishly mistaken for a sincere devotion to the country and its rights. What we most need is not the statesmanship that ostentatiously seeks to force England to that humiliating pass which alone will enable it to range the difficulty most favorably to the honor and the amity of both nations.

FOREIGN INTERFERENCE.

THE "Irish Republicans," of whom we spoke two or three weeks ago in Chicago on the 4th of July, as they proposed, and passed sundry resolutions. They set forth what they conceived to be "the duty of the Irish people in this Republic," and they asked "for the downtrodden of all enslaved lands the sympathy and support of the people and Government of the United States." They declared their hearty readiness "to stand by the Government of the Republic in insisting upon an ample apology for the wrong committed (in the Alabama affair) and full compensation for the injury sustained."

The American people will undoubtedly be grateful for this cordial expression of regard from the "Irish people in this Republic." The Americans have certainly done nothing at any time to forfeit a kind feeling upon the part of Ireland and the Irish, whether at home or elsewhere. It is also possible that a faltering line of many Irish delegates should come so far from their own land to declare their friendship for us. Indeed it is surprising that with their feeling these gentlemen do not take one more step and become American citizens. If the resolutions at Chicago had been the expression of American citizens they would have had a significance which no resolutions of "Irish people," or "German people," or "English people," or any other foreign people in this country can possibly have. Why, for instance, should "Irish people" pronounce against free-trade in this country where it is not the commercial policy that most be a very edifying spectacle if the "American people" in France should assemble and resolve against a republic. The Parisian Chauvinists would not help exclaiming, "But what then? We others are not Republicans." If Irish people are opposed to free-trade let them remonstrate at home, not in this country.

We observe also that the Convention protested against the neutrality laws of the United States, upon the ground that they are useful only to the "monarchies of the earth"—those of heaven and elsewhere we being included—and the "Irish people in this Republic" pledge themselves to labor for their entire repeal. But how is this? Is not the repeal of any law of the United States the exclusive business of American citizens? Have the Irish people, or the Portuguese, or the Russian, or the Italian, here or elsewhere, any thing whatever to do with it? If the American people in the empire of France, say, should pledge themselves to labor for the entire abolition of the existing French laws regulating elections or the imperial constitution, would they be considered a tribe impertinent? The only ground upon which any body of persons is entitled to pledge themselves to labor for the repeal of the laws of this country is that they are citizens of this country; and if they are, then they are American citizens, and can rightfully take no other national name. The instant they seek to interfere in our affairs as Irish, or German, or English, or French, their action becomes suspicious.

Politically, there are no "Irish citizens of this country," and no "Irish Republicans." As citizens we are Americans, and nothing else; as a party we are Republicans, and nothing else. Whatever tends to divide American citizenship by lines of foreign birth is mischievous and not to be tolerated. If the gentlemen who met at Chicago are American citizens of the Republican party, their action was not an authoritative party action, and tends only to perplex the party. If they would strengthen the Republican party they will have nothing to do with organizations separately as foreigners.

LATEST FROM TOOLEY STREET.

THE amusing absurdity of the theory of the civil service of this country which is held by a certain class of politicians is very well illustrated by the recent proceedings of a Committee in the city of New York in regard to the United States Marshal for the Southern District. There was a special sub-committee solemnly appointed to consider the offenses of that delinquent in the matter of appointments of his deputies. This sub-committee reported that the Marshal had "utterly ignored party" in his selection of subordinates, and that the party "can not be with impunity neglected, ignored, or defied," and so on, for a long and windy strain, the report finally exploding in certain resolutions: that the working Republicans won the fight; that they are entitled to the legitimate fruits of the victory (MR. MARCY'S phrase was better —"To the victors belong the spoils"); that the public man who ignores the working politicians commits political suicide; and that FRANCIS E. BARLOW is that public man. Thereupon the sub-committee demanded his removal, and the parent committee approved by a vote of 44 ayes to 36 noes.

The exquisite humor of this performance is the assumption of these forty-four gentlemen that they are the party which elected GRANT. They do not say, for they could not truly say, that the Marshal has not appointed as good Republicans as the members of the Committee themselves, but simply that he has not allowed the Committee to appoint for him. Honest, intelligent, industrious, capable, faithful men and Republicans he may have appointed, but not those whom the Committee designated, therefore he defies the party, and the President whom the party elected must remove him. A more ludicrous illustration of the spoils theory could not be conceived. After the booty is bagged, the President has the honor of the Presidency for his share, and the party for which he is responsible are then to be distributed among the local committees for their share. The committees are to select the "working politicians" in the investment, and whoever doubts their peculiar fitness and capacity is, in the language of the report, to be considered an "ingrate demagogue." The efficiency, the fidelity, the honesty, and the economy of the public service are of no importance; but a few gentlemen elected upon a committee—and how gentlemen are elected upon committees every man knows who is practically familiar with politics—must have the offices they want because they are the party, and the party elected the President.

The friends of a reform in the civil service of this country are greatly indebted to this amusing comedy. Those of us who hope for that reform are probably "ingrate demagogues," and we are undoubtedly defying and ignoring the party, in the opinion of the statesmen of Tooley Street, if we say that, until that reform is effected, it is the imperative duty of every appointing officer of the Government to select as his subordinates those political friends of whose qualifications for honest and efficient service he is satisfied, and with no regard whatever to Tooley Street, except so far as its recommendations may be approved by his judgment. It is a gross offense against the people of this country for any local political committee to attempt this kind of interference with the duties of the officers of the United States. Such a committee may indeed control caucuses against those officers; but it can not prevent the confidence which, upon the very grounds for which they are denounced, will be reposed in such officers by the better part of their own party, and by all their intelligent fellow-citizens.

CERTAIN "GREAT PRINCIPLES."

MR. WADE HAMPTON, who was described by the World a year ago as a kind of ideal American citizen, is Vice-President of the Southern Historical Society; and he recently wrote in a public letter asking the publication of certain records:

"We owe it as a sacred duty to our country, the future of that Republic which exists now only in name; to our children, whose duty it will be to re-establish civil liberty on this continent, if they hope to escape our fate; and, above all, to the memory of our heroic dead, that we should place upon record, where the future historian of our late war may find it, the true facts relating to our unfortunate but glorious struggle. By his unbiased choice can we vindicate principles, justify our cause, and preserve intact that which alone can give value to history—truth."

He adds, urging the appointment of branch societies in South Carolina:

"In the mean time I invoke in behalf of the Society the aid and co-operation of every man who reverres the ancient honor and renown of our State: who cherishes a proper regard for the great principles which have governed her in the past; who still believes that these principles will yet be triumphant; who wishes to vindicate the cause for which we fought, and who desires to preserve untarnished the memory of those patriots who died for that cause."

MR. WADE HAMPTON, whose public career shows him to be a very foolish gentleman, here shows how curiously he and his friends misconceive the vital point of the war, and the inevitable judgment of HISTORY. What is the verdict of History upon the great rebellion in England? That it was honorable and justifiable. Why? Because although the line between the Royal prerogative and Parliamentary privilege had never been definitely drawn, yet the King asserted his prerogative against the liberties of the people. He asserted a right that could not be expressly and technically denied, but for an ignoble purpose, and therefore the heart and conscience of mankind declare against him.

Now what is the cause for which MR. WADE HAMPTON fought? Ostensibly it was that of State sovereignty—the right of a State to secede at will from the Union—a right left obscure in the Constitution. We say nothing of the unspeakable folly of the theory, of the impossibility of any true national growth and development, of the painful limitation of every defense of freedom implied in such a scheme, because such may justly be urged not only because of a mistake in political philosophy and practice. But while State sovereignty was the ostensible cause, the perpetuity of human slavery in its most ignoble form was the real object of the rebellion. MR. WADE HAMPTON inherited and bought and sold men and women, and lived by the unpaid labor. By reason of regarding human beings as chattels he enjoyed also a political privilege which was not shared by his fellow-citizens who held to the equal human rights of all men. By asserting that the friends of equal rights were likely to control the Union, of which his State was a part, by which ascendency the system of buying and selling men and women, living by their labor, and deriving political privilege from them, might be at last peacefully abridged and even abolished, MR. WADE HAMPTON asserted the right of his State to secede from the Union. He asserted a claim, in itself innocent enough, however foolish, when regarded, but for the basest conceivable purposes.

To maintain State sovereignty that slavery might be perpetuated was the object of his "unfortunate but glorious struggle," under the pretty name of State rights, to buy and sell men and women were his "principles;" and the triumph which he anticipates is the reduction of this nation to an imbecile league, each member of which may at its pleasure enslave a part of its population. Does MR. HAMPTON suppose that History will not know this and record it? Will History know any thing of the subject that we do not, from the unspeakable treachery in the Senate to the unspeakable torture at Andersonville? As civilization advances is humanity likely to regard the savage slave system of the United States with more favor, and to honor a desperate struggle to perpetuate it? History, MR. WADE HAMPTON may be very sure, will care little about the "glorious" principle of State sovereignty, but it will not remove from the object for which that sovereignty was invoked. The bloody hand of the rebellion all the perfumes of rhetoric can not sweeten.

WAS THE POLICY OF HOLDING ON TO GRAIN GOOD?

THE drought of last year in Europe, which was most severe in Great Britain, was succeeded by a winter wholly unparalleled for mildness. In England, about the 20th of February, new leaver appeared upon the trees while yet the old remained, which, having started afresh on the termination of the drought in September, had not been subjected to the usual law which causes the leaf to drop annually at nearly fixed periods. The verdure of fields, started into new life by excessive fall rains; the turnips, sown late by way of experiment; the cereals, put into the ground in autumn—all attested by their free and long-continued growth the presence of unusual warmth and moisture during the winter, and promised what was afforded for cattle in place of foreign supplies of grain. Providence seemed bounteous in proportion to the severity of the visitation under which the English had lately suffered. As the drought extended over a large district, the uncommon season by which it was followed was not limited to England.

In comparing the value of particular crops it is not always easy to assign to each with certainty its relative importance, but there can be no doubt that grass is generally far more valuable in the districts in which it grows luxuriously than any particular crop of grain, or perhaps than all of the crops of grain united. The loss of it in England during the drought was the most felt; its recovery and continuance during the winter, especially as the growing wheat was freely pastured, did more to enable England to ride over the storm than all other causes. Cattle had been thinned off; the population had been put on an economy amounting almost to the verge of a time of allowance; the markets of the world were searched for cheap food; emigration was set on foot, but happily for England, and we doubt not for the world at large, a wheat crop struck of the characters of spring was beneficently provided, and cattle and sheep were enabled to fill themselves with the richness of the pasture instead of being subjected to an inclement season. Although this has moderated the demand for our cereal productions, we rejoice in this fortunate turn in the situation of the British Isles.

But notwithstanding this result, which could not have been foreseen, we are satisfied that holding on to grain was the true policy of our farming interest. Every consumer of farming stuffs in the United States has had a supply adequate to his means; the speculators of Chicago and New York have had as much as they could carry conveniently, if not more; and it is highly probable that, although here and there a particular producer may have been benefited by selling early, the whole mass of our farming products would have been slaughtered at price but for the policy of not producing a glut of grain at the sea-board.

It has been our endeavor, with the most sincere regard for the welfare of our great agricultural interest, to place before them their exact situation with respect to the peculiarities that consume their products, and the conditions upon which the consumers' statements of markets, generally local, could be received—a matter which in time will be well understood. The control of the world's markets is now in the hands of the principal dealers in grain of Liverpool and London, and yet it is the habit of our press to publish the quotations they daily utter through the telegram as if they were a free and full index of the state of the case, and let as between the producers of grain elsewhere and themselves.

If the farmers of the United States commit the mistake of pressing their grain upon the sea-board in such unusual quantities as to lower the price, the quotations in Liverpool are lowered in a corresponding degree, and prosperity in other localities as the test of transactions with them. The interests of the most important consumer are thus promoted in all markets at the expense of all producers. The value of the foreign food of all descriptions consumed by the population of the United Kingdom amounts now to about $400,000,000 per annum, measured in our currency, and it may be supposed that an interest, the deepest that can sway a community, is constantly operating with never-ceasing effect in the direction of cheapness.

Never until this year has there been any serious effort to check this foreign control over our productions and prices. The sickness of a drought, the severest known in England during this century, seemed to offer an opportunity for resisting the policy of English dealers, and to place the privilege of dealing with them in adjusting the price of our own products. The immense disadvantage that our grain was carried in foreign bottoms from this port, and the freights advanced as the foreigner rose to our grain limits, has operated unfavorably. The English have been obstructed in their attempts to break down the market at no other point; but the firmness of our farming interest has been perceptible in some degree, and, to that extent, to its advantage.

The demand for grain now proceeding from Europe encounters a severe money market and high freights, but prices are obtained that would have been impossible had grain not been stored in the West this season. The wheat of California received at Liverpool this spring met with severe slaughter, and such would have been our experience had the example been imitated.

As other states of Europe come into the condition of England, and attain to a growth in population too redundant to be fed with what they severally produce, the question becomes more interesting to us. How shall the price be adjusted for what we have to sell?

Mr. RODGERS, in some interesting statistics presented recently to the Union League Club, stated that our production of grain of all descriptions, measured by population, was more than double that per head of the like production in Europe; and he inferred that as abroad was constantly diminishing in its ratio to the population, and ours was being augmented, they would approximate to this country for very large supplies of food. Russia has lately pushed her railroads into new localities, and will doubtless be relied upon for many years to come to supply part of Europe with many agricultural products; but making allowance for the new districts thus connected with sea-board markets, it is very probable that the demands of Europe upon this country for food will increase to such an extent as to require on our part more attention in adjusting the price than has been considered necessary.

All that we want is a fair remunerative for our products, and, we repeat, the farming interest is more certain of obtaining it if they had loaded the merchant with what would have swamped him and produced serious disaster under the unscrupulous system which the English apply.

Last year the harvest in England commenced on the 12th of July, and continued without being interfered by rain until the 12th of August. This year it will be about a month later, as the grain is very backward, owing to recent cold weather. But whenever it may take place there is a certainty that the immense sacrifice of cattle, sheep, and hogs produced by their premature slaughter for want of food in the summer and fall of 1868, and the necessity for close feeding which has existed since, must operate severely until the harvest of 1870.

It seldom happens that the price of both our cotton and grain is high at the same moment, and it is probable that the attention of English operators has been diverted from cotton by their close attention to the manipulation of grain, and that we owe the maintenance of cotton to the neglect of similar combinations. The entire amount of money to be distributed, obtained from foreign sources, is the same as would be expected, and but for a pernicious paper system would inure to the solid benefit of the whole country.

NOMINATIONS.

THE recent ridiculous speech of Mr. ANDREW JOHNSON at Washington, and the utter indifference with which it has been received, offer a very suggestive text. A year ago Mr. JOHNSON was the President of the United States; an officer of much power, and a man of such suspicious character, that Congress thought it necessary to impeach him, as a measure of high state concern. That he was a dangerous man was not to be denied, and that Congress was justified at any measure, however revolutionary, which had a fair chance of success and a certain show of legality, is undeniable. For a long time he seriously and even pertinaciously thwarted the settlement of the questions arising from the war upon which the loyal people were involved. He was bold, unscrupulous and a menace, and when in ungovernable rage he denounced from the White House Senators and Citizens by name, there was a very uneasy feeling that trouble might be imminent.

Now, a few rods from the White House, with feeble rhiabby, he denounces his successor, and the only emotion with which his words are received is one of incredulity and shame that, at so solema a moment as the election of 1864, a man so cautiously unfit should have been placed in the possible succession to the Presidency. It was, however, not so extraordinary at the time. Mr. JOHNSON was very little known to the country before. There

GETTYSBURG—ENTRANCE TO THE CEMETERY. [SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.]

President Lincoln's Gettysburg Oration,

NOVEMBER 19, 1863.

FOURSCORE and seven years ago our fathers brought forth upon this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battle-field of that war. We are met to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting-place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this. But in a larger sense we can not dedicate, we can not consecrate, we can not hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it far above our power to add or detract. The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us, that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this nation shall under God have a new birth of freedom, and that Government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth.

THE GETTYSBURG MONUMENT.

GETTYSBURG.

GETTYSBURG, though picturesquely located, can not be called a pretty town. The number of its inhabitants will not exceed five thousand; and, aside from some work done in the way of relic manufacture, the industrial features of the place are not remarkable. Tourists may reach the town from New York by three different routes: viâ Baltimore, Northern Central of Pennsylvania, to Hanover Junction, thence to Gettysburg; or viâ Allentown to Harrisburg, thence by the Northern Central to Hanover Junction; or by the shortest and quickest route—from New York to West Philadelphia, thence to Lancaster, Columbia, Wrightsville, York, and Hanover Junction. By this latter route numerous changes of cars will be necessary, but it is undoubtedly the most satisfactory line. Arriving in Gettysburg one feels instinctively that the victims of the town are anxious to get his money: for they swarm about you with bullets, "ten cents apiece, three for a quarter." "Reb shell, Sir!" urges another, with all the iron that he can lift in the shape of a rusty cannon-ball; "have it for a dollar n'at." Splinters of wood, fragments of boulders marked by some whizzing bullet, are crowded in rare profusion before the stranger's eyes, but not one of the genus offers to burden himself with your baggage. It would seem as if the juvenile portion of the inhabitants had run mad on the subject of relics. Schools of these small fry darted about the monument during its erection, and any chip that was cut away to facilitate the setting of a stone was seized by at least three of these relic-hunters. The boxes in which the statues were brought from Italy were eagerly secured to make cases of, and the nails were preserved with great care because "Why, they came all the way from Europe!" Mr. BITTERSON, the sculptor, met with a warm reception on the day of his arrival in Gettysburg. Any number of youngsters insisted on selling him plans and accounts of his monument, and they so badgered the poor man that he bought a Gettysburg Panama for a quarter, and escaped.

Culp's Hill is the favorite resort for relic-hunters, whether Gettysburgers or strangers. The trees there are torn with shot and shell; some are so riddled with bullets that death has ensued, and the naked limbs of the stricken trees seem fit emblems of the fierce struggle that occurred between them on the 2d and 3d of July, 1863. It was here that SICCUM'S men repulsed the oft-repeated and well-sustained assaults of EWELL'S corps. Trees with two hundred bullet wounds, and rocks with nearly as many scars, attest the hot fire that poured over this historical field. Turning from this, it is but a short walk to the gates of the National Cemetery. They are opened for us by the leaves of the myrtle and verbenas that have fallen on the white marble base remind us of the red tide that stained this field.

On our way from the cemetery to the town we pass the little brick house in which ABRAHAM WADE was killed—the only citizen of Gettysburg who met that fate in connection with the battle—and she was busy making bread for our wounded.

The grove where General REYNOLDS fell is in another direction, and not far from the well-known Gettysburg Spring. The grove was used as a camping-place for the UTICA ZOUAVES, who came to assist in the inauguration of the monument, and the tree beneath which REYNOLDS fell was to them a sacred spot. An "R" cut with an axe, and a hole in the bark scars the bark of the tree, are the only marks by which the spot may be recognized.

TWO MATCHES.

It had got too dark to see the ball, and the native and enthusiastic "Olympics" of Cooperania reluctantly desisted from their practice. It was the last but one before the great match which was to pit them against the renowned "Manhattans," the then Champions. The Nine had been all present, and had worked together splendidly; and it was with a confidence but deep-seated confidence in their strength that the men withdrew to the club-house; and thence, after refreshing ablutions, strolled homeward in the late twilight of midsummer.

Ned Hope went home with Charlie Somers, not because it was in Ned's nearest way to his home, but because it was the nearest way to Nellie Somers's. Charlie Somers was the Captain of the Nine, and was at the head of his class at Columbia, but at the foot of the Nine. Still, Ned Hope was a good trusty player, always reliable on a big catch, and not seldom hitting hard at the bat. Charlie was full of the coming match, in which he hoped to lead the Olympics of Cooperania to victory and the Championship, and was inclined to his companion his views of the several members of the Nine, and his speculations on the chances of the contest. Ned Hope was distracted, as was too common with him, and said but little, now and then assenting in monosyllables to Charlie's rapid talk.

At last he broke in upon it with, "Charlie, how did your sister Nellie get acquainted with that Patch family?"

"I didn't know she was. By-the-way, Ned, that fence of Patch's is going to bother us in the game. Every long hit to right-field is going to land right in that yard."

"Yes, bother it. I had to climb the fence a dozen times to-night. I dare say the Patches are respectable people enough, in their way; but what Nellie can find congenial or improving in their society I don't understand."

"Oh, I guess they won't hurt her, Ned. Any how that fence is a help for our side as the other. You must practice up on going over it, you know; it's on your point. Look out for that, will you, Ned?"

By this time they had reached Charlie Somers's house, and Charlie left the gate open while Ned passed in. Turns or four fellows were out practicing about the grass in the broad front-yard, and Ned's heart beat quicker as he heard Nellie Somers's voice:

"Don't flinch, Maggie! Hit just a little bit harder. Here's the stake. Now, that's splendid!"

And the rubber game of croquet was finished, won by Nellie, of course.

The young men went up to the girls, and in almost no time Charlie and his sister were in high argument over their last points of play, Charlie contending that she might have beat the game half an hour ago, "It ended by her calling him a "great goose," and conclusively making it. Ned very politely greeted the young ladies, and went to work hunting up the balls and gathering the hoops.

In the parlor the conversation opened and dwelt on the one topic that had possessed the minds of all Cooperania for weeks—the match with the Champions. Charlie again passed his men in review, recounting the special qualities of each in reply to the interested questioning of old Mr. Somers. Mrs. Somers deprecated practicing so much in the hot sun of the afternoon, but admitted that the momentous issue involved made it necessary. Nellie had her opinion about the disposition of the Nine. She would rather see Teddy Snapp on the first base than Boggs. Boggs would do better for the third. It was too bad Ned had all that climbing over Mr. Patch's fence to do, but that was the point for him, she was sorry to say.

"I wish I could help you, Ned," she added. She had begun to notice that he was keeping strangely silent.

"I will tell you how you can," answered he, with a serious, meaning look and tone which she did not fail to catch.

Nellie now began to watch Ned with puzzled and uneasy glances, and he, perceiving it, and thinking that she was getting into a great mood and one suitable for receiving a lecture, felt much relieved, as though the battle were already half won. But when he lingered in the front-yard to walk in saying good-night, he was very glad to have her ask:

"Ned, what is it?"

Ned scored the gravel with his cane. Suddenly looking straight into her face, he said: "I have no right to concern myself about your doings."

Nellie could say nothing to this, and there was an embarrassing pause. Ned Hope ought to have said his good-night here and gone off, and ten minutes later he was solemnly upbraiding himself for not having done so. Indeed he found at once that he must come down from his high horse, or, with a forced smile and a feeble attempt at pleasantry, he asked:

"How long is it, Nellie, that you have been intimate with Patch and his family? I confess some surprise at this question, and Ned, thinking he had gained a point, went on: "I had brought you in the habit of choosing sides all together different sort of companions." And then, worse and worse: "I have only to say what I was very much afraid of when I saw you this afternoon, and I hope I never shall again."

Nellie's head stiffened back and her eyes flashed.

"Really, Mr. Hope, I should think you did concern yourself with my doings! I think it very probable you will have to answer for Mr. Patch's. Ned Hope, you will be sorry for this. Good-night."

The day of the Match had come at last, and all Cooperania, and a great portion of the rest of the world, were gathered round the field of contest. "The weather was all could have been desired, and a large number of the fair sex were in attendance," as the newspapers said the next day. Among the fair sex were present in large numbers, filling all the regular benches for spectators, and in the other parts of the ground, procured from the houses in the neighborhood, and making the scene brilliant, joyous, and interesting to the participants. Many of them were to display their prowess before their bright eyes and approving smiles and do battle for the glory of old Cooperania.

Yet the benches were lueless and lustreless for one knight in the tourney. Ned Hope seamed to him strong analogies between himself and the ladye fairo whose favor he wore in his heart of hearts was nowhere to be seen. He had not asked at her house whether she intended to come, and the justice of her reproach still weighed heavily on him. Could it be that she had determined even to forego the pleasure of witnessing the great match, in which he knew she had been deeply interested, in order to avoid meeting him? Was he so odious in her sight as that?

The game which was to decide the ambitious claims of the Olympics of Cooperania became monstrousness dull. It was a fine day, and in those first critical innings of the match which are always played in breathless silence, and in which each man feels that the eyes of the little world of lookers-on are upon him, as indeed they are. He heeded not the game—"his heart was far away." What glory now here could repay the disgrace in which he was held by that noblest and dearest of girls? Nellie Somers's look was the match—what was any thing to him now?

A good knock, coming straight for right-field, and the voice of Charlie Somers loved you. "Run to take care of it," roused Ned to his duty. The ball rose high, and was evidently destined for Patch's yard. Ned was over the fence in a trice, and in another moment would have been upon it, when the gate, which old Patch (who was an interested lover of the game) had already opened, malevolently kept locked against the Club, opened wide, and a domestic came out to empty a pail. Ned dashed in, received the ball, and had it back to the pitcher with as little loss of time as if the fence had never existed. The servant went in again and locked the gate.

"That was a piece of good luck," thought Ned, "and saved a run and my shins." And he had still more occasion to congratulate himself when he saw the right-field of the Manhattans struggling over the high fence, while the Olympics made more than their share of tallies. Nay, Ned had to thank his stars, or Patch's domestic, he did not know which, for the same good luck once, twice, and three repeated. The gate really seemed to swing open on its hinges immediately on the landing of the ball: but yard (whenever the Olympics were after it). and the same woman with the pail came forth like an angel. Ned's spirits rose, and were not revived that he even whispered an improper joke to Charlie Somers, quoting the Scriptural Knock, and it shall be opened unto you.

The game progressed with varying chances and amidst the most intense excitement. The "ducks' eggs," and they put down one for each of the next three innings, while the Olympics had run up a 4, a 1 and two 0's in the last. At the end of the fifth innings the clubs stood at the 3 0 0; total 15. Manhattans, 1 3 1, and the last innings to get 2 in to beat or 1 to tie.

Cooperania must not let them have that 1.

Bad Luck had seized upon the Champions in the third innings, and would not loosen her grip on their extreme hour. Charlie Somers, who was catcher, had taken their first two men out on "foul-tip" in one-two order, at the very beginning of the innings. The third striker had his will and got away to his base. The next man had done the same and sent his predecessor to the next station. The more good hit would bring that man home and beat Cooperania.

Ah! there is the hit! Away it flies (it is toward Patch's yard), and away goes the Manhattaner for the home base and Victory.

Away, too, dashes Ned Hope for Patch's fence. With his gate open at a Biddy with the pail desert him now?

No, the gate opens and she bustles out just in time for Ned's rush in by her. Ned is in the yard, thanks to Biddy; but where is the ball? He brushes hastily among the weeds where it ought to be, but can not find it. The Manhattaner must be nearing the third base. Oh, where in the hell?

As when in the conflicts of classic story the protecting deity of the hero always appears above his head at the critical moment and gives him the victory, so now a gracious goddess who had hung in breathless anxiety over the doubtful contest sent down a voice from above and directed Ned's trembling hand.

"Oh, there, Ned, under the lilac!"

Ned grasped the ball and sent it flying in an unerring parabola to the home base, and victory descended with it into Charlie Somers's outstretched hands.

A great shout went up from the field. Cooperania had won the Championship; and the Cooperanian supporters, male and female, young and old, of both sexes, wanted to devour, almost, their gallant Champions.

Ned Hope still stood in Patch's garden in mute adoration of Nellie Somers, who was waving her handkerchief from Mrs Patch's window above; for he now perceived that she had given them the victory. He threw his cap on the ground, made her the most frantic signs of gratitude and devotion, and finished his usual property three her kisses with both hands. Nellie smiled back, how sweetly!—upon him, and shut the blinds.

At the supper of the Club that evening in honor of the Champions, Ned Hope, who sat next to Nellie Somers, being called on to respond to the toast, "The Ladies," alluded with grateful assertion to "the conspicuous (he could have applause), who had never "muffed" the gate a single time during the match. (Laughter and cheers.) He (Ned) could not, he continued, properly permit him to place the credit of this masterly strategy where it belonged (Nellie Somers's face was a study, and tell-tale blushes and smiles contended for the mastery of it); but he was confident the name of Somers would ever remain among the foremost on the roll of honor of the Olympics. (Long-continued cheering and waving of handkerchiefs, hats, and base-ball bats.)

That night, as Ned and Nellie walked homeward, she told him how she had contrived to win over Mrs Patch to having the back-gate unlocked; how the "Patch girls" had ably seconded her efforts, although they were not exactly "the sort of companions she usually chose;" how she had pressed Biddy into her service and thoroughly drilled her; and how she had secured an upper window in the house to watch the game and direct her part of it. "And now you see, Ned," said Nellie, "why I am so 'intimate with the Patch family.'"

Ned hung his head in silence till they reached the shade of the front-yard. Nellie had waited patiently, for she knew he would confess he was sorry, just as she had said he would. Ned would also go into Biddy's, throw Nellie aside and took both her hands, whispering:

"Forgive me, Nellie. I should not have spoken as I did, but loved you. I could not help concerning myself about you. Can't I have the right to do so?"

Nellie's head went for this time on his shoulder, and he felt her nod assent. And then came their first kiss.

It was another "match." And Cooperania was almost as much pleased about this one as the other.

THE BRITISH HOUSE OF COMMONS.

VARIOUS as may be the opinions regarding the architectural pretensions of the "Palace of Westminster," the Gothic structure of upwards of 800 rooms raised on the bank of the Thames has come to be called, there can be but one opinion of the magnificent field of interests which are controlled by the men who sit within its walls.

It is popular now to talk of the decadence of Great Britain, and to regard with complimentary MACAULAY'S imaginary New Zealander surveying the ruins of the London Bridge from a crumbling arch of a once magnificent bridge; but before that time of Cockney desolation arrives some few generations of readers must come and go; and therefore it may not be amiss to take a glance at the history and modes of procedure of that powerful body who for six hundred years have sat within the walls of St. Stephens, and as "The House of Commons" have influenced the destinies of not alone two small islands in the East Atlantic, but the whole civilized world.

For six centuries the Commons of England have made a continuous fight for "more liberty to more people." Sometimes, indeed, that sentiment has been confined to a very sparse minority, but still has found utterance, and with no dubious sound, at every critical period of the world's history.

The House of Commons meets at four o'clock in the afternoon, the session frequently lasting until the summer sun is high in the heaven. Let us take ourselves in fancy to the door of the House when an interesting debate is progressing, and after elbowing our way through a mass of excited humanity, take a look through the open door. We can see nothing but a crowd of men: it covers the floor of the House, and the benches that rise in rank above on either hand; nothing is visible but a sea of faces and a wall of backs, so packed full is the House, even in the blowhole under our feet. The figure alone is distinctly visible: by the canopy overhead, by that long robe and flowing wig, the Speaker may be recognized. He sits raised above the throng, calm and unmoved, the representative of order. By standing on tip-toe you may get a view of the Leader of the House, who is just closing the debate. His last words have been uttered during a lull in the hideous noises which so generally disgrace the proceedings of the House; but as he sits down the storm of noise is renewed by the fierce outcries of "Ay, ay!" and "No, no!" when the Speaker, rising to his feet, reads aloud the motion in debate. That over, the scene changes.

All the doors of the House are thrown open, voices cry "Division, Division!" up and down the passages and corridors, and, lads repeat the call, set jingling sharp and clear by the touch of an electric spark that in its circuit throughout that great building rings over sixty miles of telegraph wire. Thus summoned, the members hasten toward the House from Library, Refectory, or Committee Room.

Two minutes of jangling bells and hurrying feet, then the doors of the House slam to, the turn of locks is heard. No one enters until all is over when once, at the Speaker's order, the door is closed. All within must vote, but the Prime Minister himself can not get out to join the division if accidentally too late.

Inside, for the next quarter of an hour, the strife of tongues ceases; the members are silenced by the supreme anxiety of the moment.

The House is a large square room, divided on either side by two corridors, styled "Division Lobbies," into which all the members file, the Ayes on one side, the Noes on the other. Passing up the House the Ayes face toward the Speaker, and circle around his chair into the western Lobby: the Noes turn their backs on the Speaker, walk down the house and file round into the eastern lobby; then the four "Tellers"—members of the House—two in each Lobby, take down the names of the occupants, and count the number.

This occupies some time, for in a full House probably 630 out of the whole 658 members will vote, and then the crowd is serious enough: sometimes, when the division is half over, the result of the vote is visible, and cheers burst from the winning side; and on rare occasions some fun is raised at the expense of a Minister of the Government who finds himself in the Opposition lobby, and escapes before it is too late, amidst clouds of good-natured chaff.

In close run fights the excitement lasts till the numbers are proclaimed. The counting in the lobbies consists of the tellers, the backs gate revoked with members all anxiously waiting the report of the Tellers, who, approaching from different sides of the table of the House, with difficulty meet. At length they face the Speaker in a row, side by side. A cheer suddenly bursts forth—a loud, angry and derisive cry—that be the winners who shout like that. The shouts are with difficulty hushed; all appear quite fatigue to listen to the reading, to hear exact number of the votes. Triumphantly it is proclaimed aloud by the Teller for the winners; triumphantly the winners echo back their delight.

The Speaker at length announces the decision of the House, the winners cheer where the Ayes shouts begin again in the lobbies outside; the crowd moves to and fro; fast rush to the telegraph offices, the electric wires are set at play throughout the country; the click, click of the telegraph hand is heard across the sea. The strength of the ministry is never tested by electric spark; the newspaper presses roll and shake; and in about one hour after the division the railways take up the intelligence. The long newspaper sheets are bundled into the vans; the early morning trains speed away laden with the story of the great fight. Every minute to minute, faster and faster, further and further, those tidings spread in ever-widening circles from the Speaker's chair to all Europe and America can read next morning at their breakfast-table that the Coumons of England support a Ministry who boldly proclaim the power man's right to vote.

Stormy as are the debates that forerun such divisions, fierce as is the war of tongues, not for two hundred years have the Commons witnessed any approach to open violence.

On November 28, 1641, swords were drawn, and in the blind fury the members were all but slaughtering each other; but HAMDEN, greatly respected by both parties, was able to quell the riot before any blood was shed.

Although no blows have ever been struck, yet undoubtedly the most unseemly scenes of temper are often witnessed. And the power of the Speaker is almost nil in repressing these outbursts; he has to keep order with no power to compel order; he can not commit a member to custody, fagrant as may be his conduct; he can not even order him to quit his place in the House. The utmost punishment the Speaker can inflict is to name a member—to call him by his name. An indirect rebuke is contained in this ceremony. When the Speaker addresses a member by his name, that very act implies that he has so controlled himself as to cease for the moment to be a member of the House of Commous; for there the members are never spoken of, or spoken to, save by the title of the seat which they represent. At best, however, an indirect rebuke is not much of a punishment; though by an ancient rule there arises "the displeasure of the House." What that amounts to may be gathered from the following anecdote:

A gentleman often "out of order," often needing the liberal of "naming" from the Speaker, at length asked him: "Well, what follows?" The answer he got from the Chair was: "The result of my naming you? The Lord in his mercy knows." An emphatic mode of confessing that nobody did know.

The Speaker is almost powerless in fact; he can not enter into a debate, nor can he regulate the orderliness; he can not in any way interfere with the arrangement of the work before him. He certainly can call on a particular member to speak; that is, when a dozen or two are the same moment, he can say who "catches his eye;" but even this privilege is sometimes denied him; for it is in the power of the House to settle whom they will hear. An illustration of this principle is connected with our own history.

When, in 1782, American independence had been made a fact, England was eager to acknowledge it, withstood only by the obstinacy of the King George III., and his Prime Minister, Lord NORTH. The Commons were resolved to stop the war, to throw out the King's War Minister; and after a six weeks' struggle this they did. Lord NORTH had to yield. The Minister came down to the House to announce his resignation. He rose to speak; and out of courtesy the Prime Minister is generally heard at once without question.

To be courteous, however, the House was not inclined; they loudly insisted that another member, who had also risen, should speak first, and that Lord NORTH should give way. He was, however, too skilled in debating tactics to be easily silenced; and directly the motion that the other member be heard first was put, Lord NORTH again started up to speak on that question. There was no stopping him then; and, by immediately cut discussion short by announcing that he and the Government had resigned office.

A quorum of the House of Commons is forty members. If one less be present, then it is no House; but though two members only were before him the Speaker could not declare the fact. If one member proposed a resolution and the other seconded it the Speaker would have to put the motion to a House of forty members supposed only of those two members. It would go on the Journal as a resolution of the whole 658 members.

The notice of the want of a quorum must come from some member, and then "a count" of the House must take place, debates in progress stopped, for two minutes the division-bells, as before described, are set ringing, and the doors are thrown open. Then the Speaker counts the roll upon the benches, and if the required forty members be not present the House, debate, and all it closed for the evening.

Yet though the Speaker can not himself begin a count, a very slight touch may set him off. One evening a very poor member was looking to a score of listless, sleepy listeners. He got annoyed at the paucity of members and the inattention of the few present; he had made a joke about the packed House, the crowded benches, the eager faces he pretended to see around him. The jest was bad; he had referred to the House her present; this done, and the Speaker must determine what that number is. "Order! order!" from the Chair silenced the speaker. Amazed and ignorant of the result of his wit, he saw the House counted at twenty, and his speech was never finished.

The Speaker can not leave his dignified seat unless his chair be loosened by a friendly assessor's voice. On one occasion the Speaker was actually left sitting without a member being present, and there he would probably have sat the next day had not a member been fetched back to repeat before him those magic words, "That the House do now adjourn." Even the object of a mace, the special emblem of the Speaker's authority, does not belong either to the Speaker or the House of Commons. The mace is only lent to the Speaker by the sovereign, who resumes the loan when Parliament is not sitting.

The theory of the mace is that it represents the royal person, which is always supposed to be present at the deliberations of the House. The Commons are elected by the people, but by a principle, or rather a fiction of the law, they sit under writs issued by the Crown. Therefore the sovereign, as the legal incarnation of the executive functions, is always presumed to be present.

A mighty part has the mace played in the annals of the House of Commons. When CHARLES WELL ordered it to be removed—"Take that bauble away" are the reputed words—the Rump Parliament was scattered to the winds. At the Restoration it is doubtful if the original mace was recovered, at any rate the Royal Society claim to be in possession of it, so does the Corporation of the City of London.

The power of true authority is not wanting to the Speaker, powerless though he seems. The Speaker has the greater power, because he possesses no power. It is because he represents good order without the means of compelling order that he keeps order. So excellent have been the men holding the office that for many generations no conflict has ever arisen between the Speaker and the House.

A Speaker is elected by royal command on the first day of each new Parliament, but a new man is not necessarily placed in the Chair; indeed, this is now never done. A Speaker once elected continues to preside over successive Houses until removed by death, or by being raised to the peerage and a seat in the House of Lords.

When an election takes place the usual course is for a member distinguished by long experience to suggest who, in his opinion, is most suitable for the Chair; and if no one else be proposed the election passes by acclamation. This is not always the case; the choice of Speaker has been occasionally the subject of long and hot debate. Out of the ten Speakers chosen during the last hundred years the election of seven was carried by a division, or unanimously—except in one of the election the supremacy of the Crown over Parliament reappears. Before a Speaker can act he has to ask and receive the royal approval.

This approval has been always given, with one notable exception: it was refused by King CHARLES II. to the proudest of his subjects. This was Sir EDWARD SEYMOUR. At the opening of the new Parliament in 1678 the Commons unanimously chose him for their Speaker. SEYMOUR was personally obnoxious to the King, yet he confessed that King CHARLES dared not refuse him acceptance as the Commons' Speaker. SEYMOUR presented himself at the bar of the House of Lords to fulfill the ancient formality. He was more haughty than any peer—the haughtiest man alive. His looks proclaimed all the pride he felt; disdain glittered in his eyes; and with undaunted assurance he addressed the King: "I am come hither by your Majesty's own command." In such a style no Speaker had ever before addressed a King. KING CHARLES was not to be know-beaten by his subject's haughty insolence; SEYMOUR went away, no longer Speaker of the House of Commons. Most adignant were they with the King; the Commons unanimously addressed him angry remonstrances. In vain; the only answer they could get was an assertion of the sovereign's undoubted right to refuse any choice of a Speaker; and the Commons had to yield.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

WOODENLY cares multiply. In fact, it is the fashion for two or three months, unexplored ever to be brought before the public ever since. The latest marvel is Proctor's Cave, recently discovered in Kentucky, not far from Mammoth Cave, however. A full description of this novelty is impossible, but those who have visited it are enthusiastic over its marvelous beauties. Vast avenues and halls yet remain unexplored, and the full extent of the cave will probably never be known. The entrance to it is by a romantic valley, and was at first but a narrow crevice in the rock; but it has been enlarged by blasting, and steps lead the visitor to a large chamber, called the Labyrinth, which extends about two hundred and fifty yards to what is called the Grand Crossing, where three avenues branch off, leading to separate chambers or domes. "Kentucky Dome" is of vast dimensions and regular shape. It has been demonstrated that a river exists in the cave equal in size to any in Kentucky above the falls. Proctor's Cave is believed to be the largest in the world. "Curtain Dome," the crowning glory of the cave, is nearly seventy feet high by twenty wide. On one side a sheet of stalactite, semi-transparent and looped in graceful folds, extends from the roof almost to the bottom of the dome. It appears like a real curtain—the illusion is perfect. There is an endless variety of stalactites and stalagmites in various parts of the cave. One, called "Lot's Wife," is a perfect representation of a female form. "Fairy Grotto" is another favorite bend! In "Elfin Grotto" groups of stalagmites are found which are pretty romantic statues. Also, there are a great number of sonorous stalactites which, when struck with the hand, emit a musical sound. Altogether, Proctor Cave seems to be as well worth the attention of the curious as any thing of the kind which has been discovered.

Omaha already boasts of three daily papers; and in addition to births, marriages, and divorces, one paper announces betrothals, and proposes to have still another column headed, Flirtation. Advertisers are wide awake at Omaha. One enterprising individual is printing an edition of his Prize-Book, which he intends to give away to every attendant at church. The right-hand page contains the usual prayers, but the left-hand page is allotted to advertisements. Another is trying to purchase the privilege of using the outsides of the pulpits for posting the merits of his patent baby-jumper.

Some people seem to have a strange impulse to taste of everything that comes across their path. Not long ago a certain Captain Rawden was making some explorations in the Isle of Man, with three miners. One of the men thoughtlessly filled up a carrot-like root and began to eat it. The taste was pleasant enough, and he passed some to his companions. The fatal effects were almost immediately apparent, and the man who first partook of the root died within a short time after he repast. The others suffered very severely. The vegetable proved to be the woody nightshade, a plant which is peculiarly attractive to children from its luxuriant growth and crimson berries.

Eight workmen who had been employed in a case manufactory in London recently exhibited serious symptoms of lead poisoning. All were very ill, and one died. Investigation proved that white-lead was used for fastening on the tops of biscuit sticks, and also to whiten them. It is stated that the poison was not inhaled, but that the men poisoned through not washing their hands at meal-time.

A Bavarian chemist, M. Hahn, has discovered a new kind of guano—the excrement of fowls specially fed in France to be tried at Vincennes. The compound is said to be twice as powerful as the best sporting powder, and costs less than twenty a pound. The materials for making it can be found in all countries. It makes little smoke, leaves little ash, and does not foul the gun: damp does not hurt it, nor a blow explode it; its transportation is perfectly safe; its use highly agreeable.

A sarcastic opponent of "woman's rights" says it is a great convenience to have women as post-mistresses, because they can not only inform an applicant if there is a letter for him, without looking, but can tell him what is in it.

Some very pleasant exercises took place at Newport on July 5, in connection with the presentation of an elegant boat to Miss Ida Lewis, as token of appreciation of her heroism in rescuing two drowning soldiers near her father's light-house in March last. The boat, which is of the finest workmanship, is called the Rescue; and the presentation was in Washington Square, which was filled with a crowd of enthusiastic people. An appropriate presentation address was made by Francis Brinley, formerly President of the Boston Common Council, to which Colonel T. W. Higginson responded on behalf of Miss Lewis. He commenced by saying: "I am requested by Miss Lewis to return thanks in her name to the donors and to the citizens of Newport. Miss Lewis desires me to say that she has never made a speech in her life, and does not expect to begin now. She has worked out the problem of woman's rights in a different manner. She has been accustomed to assume the right of helping her fellow-creatures without asking my question. She receives this boat with pleasure, not only as an earnest of the good feeling of her fellow-citizens, but also as a means of doing a little more hereafter, if occasion should come." . . . At the conclusion of Colonel Higginson's speech, an elegant rudder-chain, made of rose-wood, with solid silver mountings, was presented by the Narragansett Boat Club; and two silk flags, a miniature anchor of galvanized iron, with cable, an elegant set of cushions, boat-hook, and a velvet carpet were contributed by Captain Kenyon and the officers of the steamboat Newport. The demeanor of Miss Lewis throughout the exercises was truly lady-like and composed, alike free from embarrassment and affectation.

The presentation was in the morning; and in the afternoon the Rescue was launched from Long Wharf in the presence of a vast crowd. As the appointed hour, amidst much applause, Miss Lewis seated herself at the oars; and by her quick and vigorous strokes the beautiful boat was guided rapidly toward its destination, the Lime Rock Light-house.

The "Ophthalmos," a sort of self-acting photographic apparatus, is the reality a camera provided with mechanical contrivances for automatically uncovering and covering the lens and exposing the plate. It is sent up attached to a small balloon without an operator, and at any required height takes a picture of the surface of the earth beneath it, with all the bearings of the compass automatically marked.

Whales seem to be hunted now just as vigorously as in old times when gas and petroleum were things unknown. A recent suggestion in reference to their capture is to stupefy them by electricity. The harpoon is to be double-pointed, and each point is to be the terminal of a wire leading to a powerful electrical battery carried in the whaling boat. It is believed that a good dose of electricity will render the whale torpid, and render his capture easy.

Mr. Spurgeon recently introduced velocipedes in a sermon to a congregation of two thousand at Pershore, Worcestershire; and in this wise, "Those now in vestibus, which the lads were riding down our streets, would not keep up unless they were kept going; the moment they stopped they fell down; and, in this they were exceedingly like the Christian Church, which would fall unless it was kept constantly moving on."

Velocipedists are warned by the London Lancet that "human sorrows keep pace with human progress." Within the last few months both French and English surgeons have been required to treat a great variety of injuries, resulting from bicycle accidents. These injuries are of the most distressing character, spraina, general shock of the nervous system, and special and peculiar accidents resulting from the novel risks attendant on the machine.

THE ATHEIST.

Wear not for them who weep
For friend or lover taken thence, for child
That falls 'mid early flowers and grass asleep,
Untempted, undefiled.

Mourn not for them that mourn
For sin's keen arrow with its rankling smart;
God's hand will bind again what He hath torn
He heals the broken heart.

But weep for him whose eye
Sees in the midnight skies a starry dome
Thick woven with the hue that whirl and hurry by,
And give the heart no home;

Who hears amid the dense
Loud trampling crash and outcry of this wild
Thick jungle world of dim magnificence
No voice which says, "My child!"

Who marks through earth and space
A strange yet changeless scene before a vacant shrine,
And feels within his inmost soul a place
Unfilled by the Divine;

Weep, weep, for him above.
That looker for dreams, and sees unpitying Fate,
That finds within his heart, in place of love,
A dull, unsleeping hate.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY.

CHAPTER XXVI.

TWILIGHT AND DAWN.

The next afternoon, when Douglas came as usual to Auriel, Azalea did not meet him in the avenue as she had been her wont. He missed the bright face and the eager welcome of voice and hand, and felt annoyed at their absence.

"I suppose her father is requiring her services more than usual to-day," he thought; but when he entered the house he found old Moore sitting puffing away at his pipe outside the door, looking very happy in the clouds of smoke and in the contemplation of a favorite bright bird that was stretched extended in the sun, tranced in a voluptuous inertness from which not all the velvety hirings of four soft-lipped puppies could arouse her.

"Ain't they beauties?" Moore said, complacently, referring to the puppies as if nature were at his feet. "I said to Azalea, 'We mustn't keep 'em all, the mother 'll never be able to bring them up;' but she only laughed and said, 'Don't you think Him that makes young things knows best about that?' and then she wouldn't have them in a pail of cold water; when they did, and it seemed cowardly to take advantage of their not seeing, and she couldn't have them hurt; but what I think she was mistaken there, for I notice that when their eyes first open they don't look up at you as they do in a straight level, as if Nature didn't want them to stare at any thing but the mother's teats until they got stronger. They'll make beautiful dogs, I'm sure all must admit, with that proud satisfaction which all human beings appear to take in things of their own rearing. They do the work and who prophesies that whole hecatombs of rats will fall victims to the prowess of his mongrel terrier when it grows to the age of whipping discretion, to the breeder of a thorough-bred horse, who thoroughly believes that an embryo Derby winner exists in the uncreated foal that wakes up on its long legs in the paddock; from these to the human mother stirred by tremulous joy and mighty pride in her first-born—to us all think that our young crows will puke hecatombs of rats will fall victims to the prowess of his mongrel terrier when it grows to the age of whipping discretion, to the breeder of a thorough-bred horse, who thoroughly believes that an embryo Derby winner exists in the uncreated foal that wakes up on its long legs in the paddock; from these to the human mother stirred by tremulous joy and mighty pride in her first-born—to us all think that our young crows will not be unlike the rest, with the pure fairness of the dove, at least in the soaring ardour of the eagle?

"But where is Azalea?" Douglas asked, impatiently.

"Does say she's gone to pick up some plums in the kitchen garden. I said I should like some made into a pudding to-day. I can't eat any thing but what I can suck—haven't got any teeth, you know. I've often thought, Mr. Douglas, that when Eve, woman-like, did the only thing she was told not to, and ate that 'crude apple,' she hurt her teeth and sent us down toothache among other curses."

Douglas turned away to the study where he ordinarily read with Azalea.

"Not here," he muttered, discontentedly; "I hate surprises."

He sat down to a table near the window, where his own manuscripts were placed. He did a great deal of work at Auriel now. The well-stored libraries afforded him greater facilities for study and reference than he could possibly find in his own limited collection of books; and the atmosphere of romance that haunted the old place was favorable to imaginative creation. The summer winds that blew through the open windows stirred into motion a thousand quaint fancies wrought in the bold hangings. Grotesque faces laughed and wept in perpetual shadow of brown oak carving. Lovely women trailed their draperies, and noble gentlemen clashed their swords through the dim corridors. There were also two children that belonged to the place—a little girl who sat in a picture near the door, and whose stiff bodice and formal sash were a mild contrast with her baby face and dimpled arms; and a boy, a mounted warrior, aged eight, whose brown hair tumbled in loving profusion over his fierce red coat, while his small fingers were clenched over a mimic weapon of death. Azalea used to dream, when she was a child, that the girl, who was all sash and dimples, and the boy, who was all curls and coat, slipped out of the frame while their parents slept, and danced innocent together in the dusky twilight. In dream-land, where the probable and impossible are so mysteriously fused, she was not troubled by the anachronism that the girl lived two centuries later than the boy; and, for matter of that, in ghostly realms the difference of a hundred years or so is not likely to disturb ghostly friendships. The spirit of the place breathed of dream-like mystery and gorgeous decay. "I am hundreds of years old," it whispered; "none but nobles with powdered hair bow in my saloons or talk stately sentiment in their mimic scenes on the grass-grown terraces. I am centuries old: do you not see it in my dusky rich tones, transparent as the shadows of ages, and rarer than provence rose? in my ancient manuscripts, traced over by hands that were dust with the worms for generations? I am dying, but I am royal even while moribund; do not disturb the sanctity of my peace—do not unveil my failing features to the busy scorn of modern life. Above all, let not any touch ruder than the wind clang the rusty shields which our forefathers made famous in Palestine."

As a rule, Douglas rejoiced to yield himself up to the thrall of fancies like these; but to-day he felt his mood to be one that jarred against the softness of the hour.

"I am getting to be a methodical man, I suppose," he thought, wearily, half vexed at his own incomprehensible irritation; "but the fact is, I am not out by not beginning the day in the usual manner. I am in a good look for that girl and get it over, and then I shall be settled in my mind."

That which was to be got over was a long philosophical dissertation, of which Azalea was to be the heroine, illustrating the effect of exposure on the arguments to be deduced therefrom; this, and a lesson in Italian, constituted her task for to-day. As Douglas had made the announcement of his intention to seek Azalea, he saw the reflection, in an opposite mirror, of his long, ungainly figure passing in the square forehead shaded by a mass of gray hair.

"Who would have thought that I was ever rather a fine fellow?" he said, in a little touch of self-pity and contempt, as, shrinking away from the glass, he passed out at the porch. "I'll go to Azalea."

The old garden had once been trimly kept; the peaches had glowed in sumptuous profusion on the walls. The dahlias had formed a gay ward in the flower-beds, separated from the golden gravel paths by the several lines of the box border; but now the parterres obscured by moss and long grasses. The stricken stems of the hollyhocks had, in many cases, fallen helplessly over their prescribed limits, and the crimson blossoms glowed through the soft green shadow of tall nettles; as for the wall-fruit, they were concealed by the same rank exuberance in their foliage, that none but the quick eyed birds knew where to look for the ripening of their fair heads in the hot drowsy air; the convolvuli relaxed their tenacious hold of the rose-trees, and trailed so thickly among the espalier-stems, that had not the red blossoms been inert and heavy with over-bloom they might have waved themselves into life of their independent.

Douglas found Azalea under the plum-tree; but she, too, seemed infected by the atmospheric languor, for the plums were lying where she had cut touched; the misty bloom still veiling their sunscorched sides, as where the bruise of their fall on the trees of a hungry bird had pierced the purple skins. Douglas paused for a moment, and looked at the picture before him—so full of deep repose—so lovely in its simple beauty. What was this restlessness within him? What was this trouble in his eyes as they dwelt on the girl's fair head and flowing hair?

She was leaning against the smooth trunk of the tree, gazing dreamily at the dark crumbling wall opposite, while her thoughts were wandering far away over its ivied summit, floating like the birds beyond even the blue depths of this lonely place. She was roused from her reverie by hearing Douglas step near her, and went towards him, holding out her hand.

"Oh!" she said, "I had no idea it was so late, Mr. Robert. I should have been out to meet you had I known it was near your hour for coming."

Again Douglas felt irritated.

"Don't call me Mr. Robert," he said, testily.

"Well, then, Robert. Only it seems so impertinent for me to call you Robert—you who are—"

"So much older than yourself, I suppose you mean," he interrupted.

"Not only that, but so superior," Azalea answered, simply.

There was silence between them for a few moments; then Douglas said, abruptly—

"Have you learned the task I gave you yesterday?"

"Yes—no—that is to say, I don't quite know. I looked at it," she pleaded, apologetically, seeing a gleam of displeasure in his gray eyes.

"I never knew any negligence before," he said, harshly. "I will leave you now, and return to my own work."

He rose to go, and she followed him at a distance, meek-eyed, like a dog depressed by its master's rebuke. Presently she curled her little fingers round his arm.

"Please forgive me," she said, penitently. "I will study hard to-day."

Her touch seemed to thrill from his wrist to his very heart. He looked down on her, his eyes glorified by a light she had never seen in them before.

"I—I—of course I forgive you," he stammered; "but—"

Then he broke from her abruptly, and left her alone in the narrow path, wondering and confused.

"How very strange he is to-day," she thought.

"But I must go back to the tree; for, after all, I forgot to pick up the plums for daddy's pudding."

Neither tutor nor pupil made much progress with their studies this afternoon. Douglas sat and looked at his manuscript, with his face shadowed by one hand; but the other fell listless by his side, and only a flickering sunbeam moved across the blank whiteness of his paper.

Azalea, crouching down on the window-seat, strove hard to fix her attention on the page before her; but her eyes, scolding in the long grasses outside, and the loud humming of the bluebottle on the pane, singing his own dirge in a spider's web, seemed to possess magnetic attractions for her eyes and ears. She gave a furtive glance at Douglas, to see if he were noting her inattention. He seemed unconscious even of her presence; so she turned her face to the window once more, and resigned herself to dreamy memories of Douglas. It was so pleasant to her, the golden warmth of the noon. She liked to see the soft shadows creep up the lawn, and pass their cool veil over the hot languor of the roses. She reveled in the faint scents of ripe fruits and flowers, and in the stirred the warm air.

"It should always be summer-time and afternoon," she said, softly; and Douglas started at the sound of her voice, as if it had been loud and imperative as a trumpet-call.

He did not speak, however, but followed her glance, and looked out at the sky until the grey clouds of night began to thicken in the north, and the sun glowed in long red flames beyond the western hills.

To her all the murmurous sounds, all the shifting phases of Nature, seemed to convey indistinct possibilities of joy. Hope, vague but sweet as the wistful music of an Æolian harp, whispered in the wind-swayed boughs, and glistened in the golden edges of clouds that were blown toward the west. To him the autumn evening was full of sadness and desolation. The chill aspect of the sky, mixed with dreary-looking patches of weeds; the quick shadow of the wild-fowl gliding over its breast; the weird-like sound of the rising wind, filled him with inexpressible depression. The shadow of a new despair seemed to be looming behind the shadow of the coming night. Azalea's companion, he would fain have arrested the progress of time at noontide; not because, like her, he reveled in the present, but he dreaded the hours of the future. Presently Azalea broke the silence;

"What would you, if any one insulted you?" she said, suddenly; and as she spoke a blush suffused her face, which seemed to Douglas to be only a reflection of the crimson which was streaming over her head. His eyes darkened at her question, and the pain of some old memory whitened his lips more than its usual pallor, as he answered, briefly,

"It depends on what description of insult it was."

"Supposing that it were a very great insult?" Azalea pursued, in a shy, low voice.

"I should punish the offender myself, and repent my revenge all my life," Douglas said, sadly.

"But why need you ask such a question, Azalea? you are so secure from insult here as the lovely roses are from being plucked or the birds captured?"

"Oh, of course," Azalea answered, confusedly.

Once or twice she had thought she would tell of the marvelous spectacle she had seen in the glen; but the memory of a hungering outside soldier always checked the impending confidence. How could she confess to her father or her stern-faced tutor that she had looked up and kissed lips of a young soldier, as carelessly as he might pluck a flower and wear it for an instant at his breast? How could she explain that she was haunted by the memory of a pair of brown eyes, which she would like to meet again, if only to shame them by her look of proud indignation?

Douglas left Auriel earlier than usual to-night. His manner was abrupt and confused: and Azalea, scared by unaccustomed coldness, felt something of her childish fear of him return as she stood at the porch to see him go.

"I will do better to-morrow," she said, deprecatingly, when he took her good-night.

"I dare say you will," he answered, absently, and then he disappeared through the misty gloom of the avenue, and she went back to her father, and wondered why he left him what had made Mr. Douglas so cross to-day.

Meantime Douglas had passed once at the lower gate of Auriel, and looked round with a half-hope that the girl might be yet waving him an adieu. He could not see her; and the closed shutters of the house excluded from his view the eyes the solitary light that beamed in the vast and lonely house. The mist and the darkness closed over, and Douglas hurried home with his heart filled with a bitter feeling, the nature of which he dared not analyze to himself. When he reached his own dwelling he sat down in the darkness and solitude of his room, and buried his gaunt face in his hands.

"Oh!" he groaned, "surely, of all the bitter sufferings of my life this would be the sharpest!"

"I will not go there to-day; I will send an excuse," Douglas said to himself when he awoke the next morning.

On the previous night he had stifled the rising trouble in his mind by the sheer force of determination; but our clearest resolutions fade into helpless confusion under the softening influence of sleep; and in the first dawn of reawakened memory our sorrow strikes us quickly and keenly, with the surprise of a treacherous blow. A sort of sullen resentment succeeded the first flush of conscious pain.

"They do not want me excepting as a school-master for her; and she has ceased to love to learn. I will not go."

Accordingly, when the hour approached in which he usually visited Auriel, he dispatched a note to Azalea announcing that he had engagements to-day which would prevent his leaving home. He felt a certain satisfaction in surmising that the old man and the girl would miss his companionship; and with this reflection he strove to calm the restless irritation which possessed him all the afternoon. In spite of the strenuous efforts he made to occupy his mind, he was continually haunted by the aspect of the scenes in which he usually passed these hours of the day. There was the old oak door of the library creaking heavily on its hinge; there was the Virginian creeper drooping with pink-tipped tendrils athwart the diamond-shaped window; there was the quick spider counterfeiting repose on the window-sill, up until the longer grey rams within reach of its long arms. The lights and shadows that were flying across the meadows opposite were doing now in those dusky chambers, where the silence was rarely disturbed save by the twitter of birds or the music of one gentle human voice, and where only one fair face made a living light in their dusky gloom.

At Auriel the day was lapsing with the softness of dreams. He could fancy he heard the old-fashioned clocks chiming away time in mellow tinkles that, reverberating through the long corridors, sounded like the soft knell of lament for the vanishing hours. He tried only to image to himself non-sentient objects. He tried to limit his sight to the grotesque faces on the tapestry hangings—to shut his ear to all but the low whistle of the bird and the rush of the wind; but, despite his every effort to compel his thoughts into a prescribed groove, Azalea's hair would gleam in the dusky shadows of those familiar chambers—Azalea's voice would ripple in the summer wind that blew through the window, and her fingers seemed to dimple all over the pages of the book he was reading. He closed the volume impatiently, and walked up and down the room. The low ceilings and narrow space oppressed him with a sense of restraint. He would have liked to thrust the walls asunder with his strong arms, and to tramp about in the boards without. He passed into the little garden, and vented his restlessness in hurried bursts of exercise on the narrow slip of grass. Then he looked up once, and saw the red gables of Auriel shining in the evening sun. Turning abruptly in the other direction, he passed quickly down the fields, and never stopped until he reached a small town about eight miles distant, where he sometimes called for letters at the post-office.

There was none for him to-night; indeed, it was very seldom that he received any, for his mode of life was intruded on by any communication from the outside world.

He ordered and read those echoes of the world's hourly life, the newspapers, but like a limpet that clings to its rock, cold and impassive amidst the surf of waters and the tempestuous confusion of storms, he, in the dead calm of his self-immolated existence, heard without feeling the surge of the outside currents.

He did not care to glance at his papers tonight. The records of party clamor of rumored wars, of the daily lists of casualty and crime, would not accord well with the quiet peace of this remote country village, steeped as it was in the golden splendor of sunset. A few shiny-headed babies played outside the cottages, the opened doors of which revealed occasional glimpses of the forms of domestic life. Here a woman, with her head bent over her needlework—there an old man, watching the united labors of his wife and a young daughter together over his crutches. Douglas looked wistfully at the faint twinkling lights that were beginning to glimmer in some of the windows. There was "home" for every one but himself, he thought. He saw a day-laborer slouching toward one of the lowly homesteads—and the whilom Sybarite and dilettante grudged the wearied lout the coarse but cordial greeting that welcomed him to the little dark, close room of which the most costly ornaments were a solemn-looking eight-day clock, and one of those gaudy imitation japan tea-trays, which occupy in cottages a position ordinarily assumed by family portraits in the mansions, i. e., the place of honor over the chimney-piece.

A fat, unwashed-looking baby contrived with great difficulty to chase the gleam with which the tips of her round fingers, and then ran crowing with delight to the new-comer, who, tired as he was after a day of luxuries, sat down to the cheering dimpled burden on to his shoulder. A brown-faced gaunt woman was busying herself within doors. A tawny of luxuries, sat down to the cheering dimpled burden on to his shoulder. A brown-faced gaunt woman was busying herself within doors. A tawny-haired nigger girl sat at the door, hemming a school sampler. A boy of eight was looking meditatively at the circles his heels described in the air; an inward trouble caused him to be restless; he was making desperate efforts to learn his Catechism, impelled thereto by the knowledge that the vicar's annual schoolfeast was approaching, and that buns were only for little boys who could give their orthodox answer in full.

Douglas, walking swiftly down the wide lane called by courtesy a street, noticed every detail of this homely scene. He felt as a famished bird might that soars over the fat plumage of golden grain, showered down for the use of domesticated fowls.

That squalid cottage was filled with loveliness for the tired workman. The house might be small and dark, the chambers closely packed as cells in a bee-hive, but there was refuge from burning suns and biting winds. There was the tendance of hands, rough, it is true, but made gentle by love. There was the sweet human pride of paternity, and that sense of comfort in fellowship, which is in such strange contrast with the solitude of the vast, dark high-road we are compelled one day to traverse alone.

The shadow of a rare and undefinable pain filled Douglas's eyes as he turned his back on the picture of life's fruition, and walked in the direction of the silent, desolate abode.

How was it that the name he had striven to repel from his memory all day leaped to his lips simultaneously with the sigh he breathed for unattainable social joys?

"Azalea," he murmured, softly; and as his ears heard what his heart had uttered his pale cheeks flushed and his head drooped lower on his breast. He walked quickly on, as though his hasty footsteps could stamp out the fire that was smouldering in his mind; passed by the cottage windows, twinkling like multitudes of rubies in the sun; passed the faded paint of the village inn—an anchor painted on a board which had been rifted in two by accidents of time and weather. In a little while the sign creaked in darkness; the windows reflected inward instead of outward light; the doors were all closed; and the pence of night happened over the quiet town and over the fields through the shadows of which Douglas's tall figure passed a darker moving gloom. He thought with repugnance of the gray-walled cottage standing low in the green glooms of the dusted lane. He pictured to himself the sullen sky darkening above the low thatch, the dew-wet rose—their red glow obscured by the night—nodding round the small casement. For the first time for three years the dense peace of his life seemed distasteful to him. He felt a wild desire to stand on the rugged declivities, to catch the mad foam of the torrent in his hands, to breathe stormy airs that whirl round the misty summits of snow hills.

There was a strange tumult in his heart which accorded ill with the dull still atmosphere that surrounded him. His thoughts were reversed as intervals to the wild freedom of his old life; he fancied that he would be more at ease if he were overpowered by fatigue, or menaced by danger than he was in the calm security of these civilized solitudes.

He brushed the dew off the woodbine, and trod the trailing bramble under foot in his hasty transit through the fields. In his restlessness he walked as rapidly as if one who loved him awaited his return; but when he neared his cottage-door his steps slackened, and he paused at the garden-gate, half dreading to encounter the dark loneliness of his small sitting-room.

There are times when existence is as a shroud which swathes one so tightly that it rebels feebly against the horror which oppresses him. On this night Douglas felt life to be all clouds; the myrtled wooded valley about above conveyed to him no sense of immensity. He passed through the vast fresh air in his way to a vault fashioned by himself. He had been desolate, but free. Now he was desolate, but in bonds.

CHAPTER XXVII.

"HOW DO I LOOK, DEAR?"

THE time was evening, the place the Misses Orme's drawing-room at Orme Castle. It was the night of the ball, and all the preparations for the forthcoming entertainment were completed, with the exception of Rosa and Amelia's toilets. At this moment Rosa was in the grub stage—her hair twisted tight in an ungainly bundle at the top of her head, and her face buried in the folds of a soft towel; for, "On nights like these," as Amelia said, solemnly, "friction must not be applied to the cheeks to shine." Amelia was developed into the butterfly: her hair was frizzed in golden profusion over her forehead; fresh shining ringlets hung about her. Her ornaments were pearls; her lips were red and her shoulders white. Altogether she was a charming picture of studied innocence.

"I'm done," she announced, triumphantly. Then, in a solemn tone, she put the question that had been on her lips ever—

"I'll look directly," came in a stifled voice from behind the towel; and in the interim Amelia advanced to the glass before the mirror with a look of affectionate admiration at the image reflected there.

"Come into the light," Rosa said, when the face-drying was completed.

Amelia obeyed meekly.

"Um, pretty well; but a little too much pig with one ear, you know;" with a significant glance at one rosy cheek.

It was a point of honour that the sisters should speak the truth to each other on these occasions, however unpleasant it might be to hear or to utter.

Amelia looked at herself again. "You're quite right," she said, in a tone of deep conviction. "I shall put a little more on the left side."

"Two wrongs make a right," as the horsecowper said, when he put a bean in his horse's sound foot," quoted Rosa, pertly.

"Where did you pick up that stable slang?" Miss Orme said, disdainfully.

"From papa. But do go away, Amelia; you are taking up all the glass; and I shall never be ready in time."

"People always think so if they see other people dressed first," Miss Orme observed, phlegmatically. "I shall go and see if Lady Diana is ready. She has had a box down from town; but," she added, with emphasis, "one comfort is, do what she will, she can't make herself look otherwise."

"Come back," called Rosa, "before I go down, and tell me if there is too much powder on my nose. Candle-light can not be trusted."

Amelia promised assent, but in the fault of her faith; for on reaching the one sitting-room which had been left comfortable in the general exodus of furniture she found Captain Mowbray seated in an easy-chair, deep in the perusal of Ruff's Guide to the Turf.

"I called to see your father about a horse," he explained, in answer to Miss Orme's pleased look of surprise. "He asked me to dine with him in his library, and to send into Brighton for my dress clothes. I hope I shall not be in your way here."

"Oh no!" Amelia said. Then she wondered what o'clock it might be, and where papa was; why Mr. Douglas was still in the little meadow, sees speeches and movements which are apt to exacterize the manner of a very young lady when in the society of the man she prefers.

Meanwhile Lady Diana Merton, who was a visitor at the house, and who had managed to locate herself in the most comfortable suit of rooms it possessed, was seated in an upper chamber, looking out of her window, which commanded a fine view of the surrounding down and the quivering ridge of fir-off sea.

Make herself comfortable she certainly could not. Almost the only triumph beauty can not accomplish is the reversal of Time's hour-glass. But Lady that lucky woman, how she would have wished that the golden sands had marked an hour less in her life? To the mellow flush of a lamp in that warm room reproduced the dull glow to earth—to the rich fragrance of the gardenia blossom as it expands in the heat of noon—to the last but most delicious touch of the powder-puff (this simile is not poetical)—to aught else that is emblematical of perfection her mature loveliness might aptly be likened. Its charm was that neither tresses as luxuriant, as ever; her lovely gray eyes were not a whit less full of sweet content than when their light was new. Time had wrought the enchainment of Thurstan Mowbray. With a figure even more luxuriously beautiful than seventeen; with lips as red and as full as they still round and dimpled, you will not be surprised to hear that Lady Diana was as charming, as bewitching, as unprincipled as she had ever been. She was not a woman to resign her unholy power. She charming until the power itself failed her. Then she would have writ enough in the book of failure and retire from the arena where she was not strong enough to conquer. She thought it a great pity that she should grow old. She deplored the inevitable necessity, but she meant to bear herself gracefully to the blight of Time: and so soon as she found herself unable to be fair and women to hate her, it was her intention to become pensive and build a church, if possible; or, if that was too expensive, at least put up a memorial window in one. Meantime there was no need yet to think of it. She had time for worship nor choose the subjects for the stained glass, so she ate, drank, and was as merry as it was in her character to be. Unprincipled nature to be. She was not yet in full dress, for she liked to be perfectly comfortable as long as possible, as she was accustomed to do in the days when tinted Cashmere dressing-gown, sipping a cup of tea and turning over the leaves of a novel until such time as the sound of carriage-wheels should warn her of approaching guests. Novels did not amuse her very much, she thought, as she put down this one gently, and took another from the spaniel's ears; she could recall infinitely more romantic incidents in her own career than those ordinarily published in books. She had a much greater sorrow of heart represented by a few commonplace words than ever was expressed in the most affecting sentences of fiction. Indeed, she had caught glimpses of drier tragedies in the drama of life than any that have darkened the pages of a three-volume romance. Nothing is more terrible because the guilt was real and the punishment true. Of all human passions that of love seemed to her most inadequately delineated in books. That of which she read sounded but as a very feeble echo of what she had herself heard wrung from the pain of living hearts. She whose name had been a joy and a rapture, a well and a cure of delight to the man who she had heard it breathed in every imaginable accidence of emotion, from the low murmur of himself tenderness to the shrill, harsh utterance of wounded passion—she who had seen faces of hope and flush at her words, had turned the wise into fools, and the fools into madmen, through the strength of the sentiment she was able to inspire—was it no wonder she felt the ordinary platitudes printed in books as absurdly inadequately described a passion which is at once the strength and the weakness, the glory and disgrace, of man's undisciplined heart?

Lady Diana was aroused from her contemplation of the spaniel's glossy head by the sound of two voices outside the window; one was that of Amelia Orme, and Lady Di at once understood that Miss Orme's companion was not of her own sex.

"So Amelia has a flirtation on hand," mused Lady Di. "I wonder why it is that girls get so full of affectation on these occasions? Why do they giggle when there's nothing to laugh at, and make up a mysterious voice when their own would answer the purpose equally well?"

Lady Diana arose and leaned out of the window.

"I might as well have a look at him," she thought. "if I find I do not admire him very much I'll respect the laws of hospitality and not disturb Amelia's sport."

"Let me disengage this for you," Captain Mowbray said, in a tender voice to Miss Orme, referring to a stray blossom of overhanging clematis, which had become entangled in her fluffy braids. The clematis grew directly under Lady Diana's window, and Thurstan was lingering rather longer than was necessary over his task when he accidentally looked up, and saw a woman's head and shoulders—a lovely living picture in a frame-work of dull red bricks and rippling ivy leaves.

The sunset flushed the fair face and warmcoloured masses of hair. The mellow glory; the soft gray tints of the wrapper folded over her bosom, and the dark crimson rose which nestled behind one ear, made the perfection of coloring which Titian would have exulted to immortalize. As Captain Mowbray caught sight of the serene, unforeward face, Miss Orme gave an exclamation of pain and anger.

"Really, Captain Mowbray, you hurt me very much. You've pulled out quite a big lock," pulling her hand to the disarranged braid.

"I beg a thousand pardons. I am so grieved at my stupidity," he murmured in a low voice. Then he looked up at the window and took off his hat. "I am so delighted to see you again, Lady Diana," he said aloud. "If you are not already hampered by engagements, may I hope for the honor of the second valse with you?"

Lady Diana smiled pleasantly.

"I never dance now. It is the nature of young things to dance—lambs, young kids, young lambs, young kittens, and young cats may be so with propriety; but at my age one should be a spectator, not a participator in spring-tide gambols."

But in her heart Lady Diana thought that her old path had been a miserable progress—even at their last meeting, when he allowed her, as he said, "To get a rise out of him."

"Then you will not?" she muttered, as she retreated to her toilet-table. "Fancy once more looking at me and asking me to be second in any dance!"

His self-possession annoyed her more than she cared to acknowledge to herself. He was handsomer than ever—handsomer though—much too handsome for that pasty-faced chit, Amelia.

"Why do young girls always wear white dresses?" she said, looking spitefully at Miss Orme's retreating figure. "These emblems of virginity always suit and allows so forcibly." Then she sat down to her writing-desk and wrote out a little volume bound in blue velvet and guarded by a lilac-coloured clasp.

"There is still an hour to spare," she thought, "before the company will arrive. I will add a few axioms to my book of moral reflections."

PART I.—LADY DIANA MERTON'S MORAL REFLECTIONS.

Never write compromising letters to a married man. Sooner or later they will fall into the hands of his wife. Even if she be too high-bred to show them in his coat pocket, and from the time of that domestic ecclandre in the house of the Captain of King's Regulars always to the present date much mischief has arisen from the shifting of a coat.

It would be better to avoid lovers with legal encumbrances altogether. It is a pity, too; for there are some charming Benedicks whose only fault is that they are married. Be wary with those whose wives also "Live in Arcadia." The wife who is there are no bas bleus in this case, "once a coquette always a coquette") a flirt, brings all the advantages of finished experience to assist her in detecting the clumsy manœuvres of her spouse.

Supposing you evade the dangers of correspondence, there are many other perils to be considered with reference to this "two-natured" class. Generally the husband is the person least interesting to his family; will be not some day, when over-oppressed by the infection of his position, reassert his dignity at your expense? Can you bear the dark hints of some one who knows how to appreciate him, and ostentatiously show the new locket at his watch-chain to the exclusion of mention of your name? Some poor weak fools there are who do these things once, and, like other enslaved races, fall in love after the first attempt at rebellion.

Then there is the good and conscientious man, whose virtue increases as his feet grow weary of treading the thorny path. With a burst of moral sentiment, he will suddenly confess all to his wife; together they anathematize the snare, and cement their union. He adds treachery and cowardice to his former vice, and imagines that the abnegation of the sin he has ceased to desire is an adequate penance penitence. Such is the most despicable of all the species.

If you have a fancy, give it to a married man, nor in any way make yourself uncomfortable for his sake. Sooner or later he must and will repay you for it. Be dark and like Jane give her an unassailable vantage-ground. The horse that escapes to the pasture, and kicks up his heels contentedly, is rescued—caught—but in his fictitious freedom, will return meekly to his stall at the feeding-hour. And the married man (whose place is in the stall in the plight of a novel wickedness) will always return to the bourne where his easy-chair, his slippers, his daily coverings, his children, and his wife—and the mother of his children await him. This reflection has a decided moral tendency. Wives, be patient with your husbands. Should he make a slight deviation from the paths of conjugality, you will be able to, in sporting parlance, "make a good thing out of it." He will tire of his new love as certainly as he has tired of you; and you have in your favor nine points of the law.

Trust no woman. Nor men either, if you can help it. I have sometimes wished in my heart that all men were deaf, and unable to write their own name—much less mine. They seldom say any thing worth remembering. There is a dreadful sameness in their protestations. Their caligraphic efforts are rarely of sufficient importance to art to stone for their terrible carelessness about blotting-paper. Blotting-paper and ladies'-maids are the support of the Drivers Cent.

Your unmarried men are, as a rule, to be moderately trusted—unless, indeed, they are prone to habits of intemperance. You must not object to their pulling up their shirt-collars uneasily when you are mentioned, or to their discreet and violent defence of you to your spiritual rival. These are the follies of youth, and though they betray the boy's feelings they do not necessarily impair your complicity.

My reflections in this place chiefly concern the bigger and stupider sex. In another part of my note-book will be found a few observations on the wiser half of humanity.

PART II.—GENERAL AXIOMS.

Our greatest misery generally arises from our overstrung ourselves. We get dreadful hurts through our vanity, and think it is our hearts that suffer. I appreciate myself (no woman succeeds who does not), but I am rarely blinded by my self-esteem. I know when my nose is red, or when I am otherwise looking plain. Then I conceal myself from the view of mankind. Some women are less modest, and are consequently less successful.

If you have genius, conceal it as you would a great baby. Hide it, as Bruton did, under the appearance of idiotcy.

Tact is the supremest weapon in the hands of a woman. It is the fine tool that rives the chains of beauty.

At the first short letter your lover writes you, dismiss him. No man who knows has ever need to excuse a neglect to his mistress.

Let no lover ever feel that he had ever made a sacrifice (even of a cigar) for you. Promote his comfort in small matters, partly because it is Christianlike to offer some compensation for the torment you inflict on him, chiefly because his attention should never be distracted from you by the torture you inflict.

Never forget that men's vanity is greater than their hearts. They will forgive a wound to the latter sooner than an insult to the former.

Never love at all where you wish to be loved greatly.

As no one is abused save to a willing listener, the friend who tells you she has heard you calumniated must be ranked with the calumniator.

Listen to nothing your friends have to tell you for "your own good," and because it is "for duty;" it will assuredly be something unpleasant.

An Englishman will trust his friend with his mistress sooner than with his horse.

A wife will be faithful to infidelity as one where the ashes are already burned black. But every thing has its price, and can be reached either through his vanity, his fears, or his intellect, his passions.

It will be understood that the concluding portion of Lady Diana's MS. was written after the little episode at the window.

When her toilet was completed she looked at herself in the mirror with mingled admiration and regret. The admiration was for herself, the regret was for some one else. It may not be promised that he was of the masculine gender, for her maid heard her murmur something which sounded like "Poor fellow!"

ARTESIAN FISHES.

We have all heard of Artesian wells, but a wonderful novelty is now exhibited in Algeria in the shape of Artesian fisheries. A well lately made at Chott-Melrir to the depth of forty-four metres threw up not only a large body of water, but, to the great surprise of the engineers, an innumerable quantity of small fish. These subterraneous vertebræ are described as being on an average half an inch in length, and resembling whitebait both in appearance and taste. The female is distinguished from the male by the presence of dark-colored stripes on the upper part of the body. From the fact of the water which issued from these wells being identical with that which forms the bed of the Nile it is concluded that an underground communication must exist between them and that river.

TRANSPLANTING TREES.

IN European cities, and especially in Paris, the great necessity for the removal of large trees of all kinds desirable for shade and ornamental purposes was long ago settled beyond all question. Experience and practice have made working two generations for them to grow into unprofitable dimensions, go to the forest and select whatever may be ripe for their destiny.

Autumn and winter are the best time for their removal. The trees of all take the leaves of the tree with a true compass. Then dig entirely round it, the centre of the circle being the trunk, and the circle itself being ten, fifteen, or twenty feet in diameter, so as to be quite beyond all the essential roots. Cut the trench full two feet deep—as much as fifty men can do. Shaking of levers raise the mass, supporting the tree perpendicularly by ropes in the hands of assistants, and, finally, lift it on to a cart with a broad, strong sled. Horses or oxen may then transport the load to where a hole has been dug to receive it, the exact facing of the tree in regard to points of compass as before being observed. It will thrive precisely as it did in its primitive locality, without the least indication of having been any way injured by the voyage. A full park might be readily be thus created in a week as in half a century. Our Central Park has been thus improved; and the Champ de Mars, at Paris, was thus transformed into a grove for the Exposition in a few weeks.

CUBA.

EMILIO CASTELLAR.

THE new Captain-General of Cuba, CABALLERO DE RODAS, has commenced his administration with great vigor. Fortunately for him, he has had no serious conflict with the Volunteers. He has commenced operations against the insurgents, who will find him a more wary and energetic foe than his predecessor. He has also issued a proclamation closing all the ports on the east end of the island, except Sagua, Cubanien, Nuevitas, Gibara, Baracoa, Guantanamo, Santiago de Cuba, Manzanilla, Santa Cruz, Sasa, Trinidad, and Cienfuegos. Vessels and their crews, if armed, engaged in transporting filibusters to Cuba, are declared pirates. Spanish cruisers on the high seas are instructed, in boarding vessels, to observe all the restrictions as to the right of search contained in the treaties of Spain with the United States and Great Britain.

Count VALMASEDA, the Spanish General commanding in the Bayamo District, and also known as "The Butcher," on account of his cruel proclamation issued in the spring, has recently distinguished himself by the capture of a rebel intrenched camp at Sagua, containing a powder-mill and a quantity of war material, being, in fact, a complete arsenal.

Count VALMASEDA first came prominently before the Spanish public in the year 1854, when, having reached the rank of Chief of Staff, he offered his services to the Liberal party, who had risen in arms. He reached the field of the battle of Vicalvaro when the strife was at its height; but was wounded by a discharge of grape before he could incorporate himself with the Liberal army. He was discovered by his friends upon the field the same night which closed the battle, and was hidden in the town until he could be secretly conveyed to the house of one of the embassadors in Madrid, where he lay for a long time in so precarious a state that his life was despaired of. After several dangerous operations for the extraction of the metal from the wounds in his head, he finally recovered, to find the revolution triumphant and himself named to the command of a regiment of foot. At the commencement of the war with Morocco he was ordered to Africa with his regiment, to form part of the division of General ECHAGUE, who opened the campaign in 1859. He is said to have distinguished himself on many occasions, and particularly by the cool and able manner in which he manœuvred his regiment in a dangerous position at the storming of the Seraglio. He won the reputation during the war of a rough, frank soldier, who in camp merged all distinction of rank and mingled freely with his men, and in the field always led his regiment on foot and shared the danger and hardships of the commonest soldier, while, at the same time, he maintained such strict discipline as made his command a model for the army. He returned to Spain in command of a brigade, and was some years later proposed to the Queen, by O'DONNELL, under whose eye he had fought, for the rank of Field-Marshal, and was also (in 1866) appointed to an important post, of which he was deprived by a change of ministry the following year. He then retired with his family to the town of Zamora, where he remained until sent, with a number of other prominent generals, under an order of banishment to the Canary Islands. After a residence of a few months he was recalled by the revolution of Cadiz in September last, and arrived in time to receive from General SERRANO a command at the battle of Alcolea, which decided the fate of Queen ISABELLA. He was further promoted by the Provisional Government, and made Director of Artillery and Captain-General of New Castile. His deeds in Cadiz, Seville, and Malaga, in the suppression of Republicans who rose in arms against the abuses of those they had put in power as they had previously risen against the Queen, speak little for his liberalism or that of his party. He was deputy to the Cortes from Zamora when he received his appointment to Cuba. He is a man of low stature, somewhat advanced in life, and has the reputation, among those who know him, of possessing an indomitable will and great energy; and he is unscrupulous in carrying out what he conceives to be his duty. He arrived in Cuba at a time when his abilities were put to the severest test, and when he could only gain the approval and support of his countrymen by sanctioning an indiscriminate slaughter that made him execrable to the whole world. The bare fact of such a man being appointed at such a time shows very clearly that the only liberalism Cuba can expect from Spain is the liberalism of the sword.

During the short interregnum since the rising of Cadiz, in September last, until the election of the present Regent, for the first time in three hundred years the voice of truth could be raised in Spain without being silenced by the garrote or the Inquisition, and it has poured forth from the mouth of EMILIO CASTELLAR—the great Republican leader and the champion of right and justice against theocracy and aristocracy—in tones so forcible and impassioned as to unsettle the very foundation of the things that were, and stamp him one of the greatest orators of the present day. In the late debate in the Spanish Cortes upon the Cuban question he made a brilliant speech in her defense, from which an idea may be formed of his principles. He stated that he followed only the dictates of his own conscience, because he believed that its dictates were those of justice: that he did not hold two opinions, but that all that he spoke in private he dared to maintain in public before the whole world; and that Cuba had suffered great injustice at the hands of Spain, after having been deceived with false promises year after year since 1837, when her deputies were refused admittance to the Cortes and sent away unheard. She had been invited again to send representatives to place their grievances before the government, and after having done so, had again been put off with false promises; and the only answer to their just claims was to impose upon them a new and odious contribution. He maintained that the rebellion was not the work of a day nor a year, but the final result of years of error and flagrant injustice; that in the nineteenth century a people could no longer be kept under the receiver of that great air-pump called Despotism; that it was no longer possible to maintain Cuba and Porto Rico like two great blots on the broad field of Democracy that covered all America; that it was difficult for a people to govern itself, but impossible for one people to govern another people; and that nothing but liberty and a government like that of Canada could preserve her colonies to Spain.

THE "RED STOCKINGS" AT HOME.

WE give on this page an illustration of the presentation of the champion bat to the "Red Stocking" Base-Ball Club on its return to Cincinnati, July 1.

Upon its arrival at the depôt the Club was received and escorted through the streets by the citizens, who gave it a perfect ovation. In the afternoon a display game was played on the Union Grounds, where the presentation of the bat took place. The bat is of ash, and measures twenty-seven feet in length, nineteen inches in diameter at the bat, and nine and a half at the wrist. It is proportioned like the regular play-bat. Handsomely painted upon it is the inscription, "Champion Bat, 1869. To Cincinnati Base-Ball Club, First Nine—H. Wright, Allston, Waterman, Sweasy, Gould, Ker, Hallman, G. Wright, Leonard, Gould, Hublet." It was presented by the Club and the Cincinnati Lumber Company.

Mr. Carter Gazlay, Secretary of the Cincinnati Lumber Company, made a graceful presentation speech, alluding to the twenty-one victories which had been won by the "gentlemen of the first Nine" without a single defeat. A large number of speeches were also made at the banquet at the Gibson House in the evening by prominent gentlemen of Cincinnati.

HON. GILBERT C. WALKER, GOVERNOR OF VIRGINIA.

This election of Mr. Walker as Governor of Virginia is very significant. It is a victory for General Grant's administration, the result being in consonance with the President's policy as to reconstruction. It is a victory for impartial suffrage and universal amnesty. Governor Walker is pledged to support the policy of the Government as regards the treatment of the colored race; but he is opposed to the unconditional disfranchisement of the whites. "We must remember," he said at Norfolk, just after the election, "that we have succeeded on the principle of universal suffrage and equal rights; and we must see that those who opposed us, as well as those who supported us, have all their civil rights, and are protected fully by the law." The returns from eighty-four counties gave Walker a majority of 23,000. He was until a few years ago a citizen of Binghamton, New York, where he was born. In 1856 he was nominated by the Democratic party in the County of Tioga for Attorney-General, but was defeated. He soon after removed to Chicago, where he identified himself with the Douglas party. Since his residence in Virginia he has distinguished himself as an able financier. He is known as a man of sterling integrity.

BURGLARS' IMPLEMENTS.

One of our illustrations on page 477 shows the burglars' implements discovered in the Ocean Bank of this city after the robbery of June 27. The tools and were of every conceivable kind and of the best quality, consisting of over 400 pieces. The burglars remained in the bank from Saturday night until Monday morning, working at their leisure. They entered from the basement. The basement of the bank was formerly one room, and was occupied by the Globe Insurance Company. William Okell subsequently rented it for an exchange office, and subdivided it into three compartments as shown in the diagram. The middle and rear apartments he offered for rent, reserving the front-room for his own use. About three weeks before the robbery a well-dressed, gentlemanly appearing person engaged the inner or rear room, as he represented, as an agency for the Chicago Life Insurance Company, agreeing to pay $600 per year rent, monthly in advance. He paid one month's rent, $50, on taking possession. This office is directly underneath the private room of the President of the bank, and has an entrance on Fulton Street. A person engaged in the Insurance business the burglars introduced their tools, and on the night of the 27th cut a hole through the floor to the bank above, where they secured about $1,000,000 in available funds and securities. They were also prepared to encounter opposition, having several bowie-knives, revolvers, two pairs of steel handcuffs, a coil of rope, cartridges, etc. and a full line of disguises they were equally well prepared, having every thing at hand with which to array themselves as gentlemen, as longshoremen, or in any other of a dozen characters. They also left behind a supply of provisions, choice liquors, cigars, etc., showing that their larder was well supplied.

On the morning of June 30 a search was found by a policeman in Elizabeth Street, which was marked, "For Captain Jourdan, Sixth Precinct," and which was found to contain $268,021 —a portion of the stolen money.

CORRESPONDENCE.

STEAM CULTIVATION.

For many years it has been the dream of the enthusiast that steam might become the motive power in cultivating the land, and that the car of Agriculture would only make permanent progress when propelled by that agent. By those thoughtful men who saw how important it was for the producer to add to the productive capacity of his boon, and for deeper tillage, steam was considered the power to satisfactorily solve the problem. In this country, where capital in the hands of the cultivator has been, and is to a comparatively scarce, steam-engines have made slow progress in farming operations. But in England, and latterly on the Continent, especially in France, steam-power is being largely developed in agricultural operations, and even as a motive power.

The other day I was invited by a wealthy and enterprising merchant of Philadelphia, Colonel W. C. Patterson, to visit his farm some twenty miles below Camden, in New Jersey, and witness the trial of a steam plow, or, more properly, of an attempt to plow by steam. The farm consists of about 30,000 acres. It is of varying breadth, being from 50 to 100 miles wide, and the soil has great agricultural resources if properly worked. The Colonel imported the tackle from England, which consisted of two 14-horse locomotive steam-engines, a double set of two gangs of 6 each, a cultivator, and harrow, all rigged to be worked by the engines. The engines were landed at the river-side, some two miles from the farm, and propelled themselves out to the field, over uneven and bad roads to move a heavy load upon. The weight of the engines, and their unsteadiness, for heretofore I had seen only portable engines employed in the labors of the farm, particularly in threshing. The field selected for the trial was an oblong square, containing one hundred or more acres. It was an old field, but had been long under cultivation, tolerably level, but smooth only in places, as much of it had been in corn the previous year, and the corn-rows were therefore uneven by reason of the old hills where the corn had grown. The soil was a sandy loam resting on a clay-loam subsoil. The plow never cultivation had been at an average depth of about 5 inches, and formed a hard crust below, which the plow-members of additional power to break.

The engines were placed on opposite sides of the field, some 370 yards apart, and opposite to each other. The cable was made sufficiently long to reach across the field was attached to each engine, and run off or was wound on to the drum of the engine as required. The plow was so that there was not a sober man in the land. Even the cows, goats, and fowls got drunk also by drinking the mixture left in the jars after the people were all down. In his view it was a happy region, where one could indulge in as much intoxication as he liked without being disturbed by mischief-making moral reformers, whom he probably conceived to be disturbers of the public peace.

THE GREAT DENTAL DISCOVERY

Of the age was made when the bark of the Soap-Tree, of the Chilian mountains, was incorporated with the other vegetable materials of fragrant SOZODONT. Its property of arresting decay and obliterating discolorations in silks, muslins, etc., first suggested its use as a purifier and preservative of the dental enamel; and its effect as associated with other antiseptic vegetable substances has proved one of the happiest results of modern experiments.—[Com.]

"FRESH AS A MAIDEN'S BLUSH" is the pure peachy complexion which follows the use of HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM. It is the true secret of beauty. Fashionable ladies in society understand this.

The Magnolia Balm changes the rustic country girl into a city belle more rapidly than any other one thing.

Redness, Sunburn, Tan, Freckles, Blotches, and all effects of the summer sun disappear when it is used, and a genial, cultivated, fresh expression is obtained, which rivals the bloom of youth. Beauty is possible to all who will invest 75 cents at any respectable store and insist on getting the Magnolia Balm.

Use nothing but LYON'S KATHAIRON to dress the hair.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS seem to possess the quality of Accumulating Electricity

and imparting it to the body, whereby the circulation of the blood becomes equalized upon the parts where applied, causing pain and morbid action to cease. The Porous Plasters are flexible, and found of a great help to those who have weak backs or pain in the side. Especially are they valuable to those who have neglected colds. They are often preventives of Consumption: nay, they are believed to have loosened the grasp of this terrible affliction, and been mainly instrumental in effecting a cure. In variable climates they should be worn on the breast or between the shoulders, or over the kidneys, by those who are subject to take cold easily.

ADDRESS TO SMOKERS.

In reply to the many inquiries made daily in regard to Meerschaum Pipes, we wish to state that we recommend, especially for home and office use, the plain Hungarian and Egg Bowls, with Weichsel Stems. They hold the most tobacco, and are the most generous and practical ones, being the easiest to clean. Or the Hamburg Bowls, having the largest surface to show color. For travelling and street-smoking, we recommend the London Straight and London Bend.

Being represented exclusively throughout the country by our goods, we are desirous to have our Pipes—which are considered equaled by none—still more extensively used by those who relish a good smoke, and find them very reasonable. Therefore we have reduced our prices in the following:

We will sell a No. 3 Pipe for $5, and charge $3 additional for every number higher therefore No. 4 costs $8, No. 5 $11, No. 6 $14, No. 7 $17, No. 8 $20. No. 3 is considered full-sized ones; from No. 9 upward, large ones. In the price is included a Case and Stem.

Nice Amber Mouthpieces for Weichsel Stems we are selling from $1 to $3 a piece.

We send by Express to collect on delivery, amount and charges; but suggest that the amount be sent in Registered Letter or Post-Office Money Order in advance, to save consignee the express-return charges.

In conclusion, we wish to state that we warrant all our goods (which we stamp with our name) to be real Amber, genuine Meerschaum, and to color, and will readily give every information in regard to it, based on thirty years' experience in the trade, having received our Diploma in 1858 by the respective commissions in Europe; and we will ever uphold the fair fame we have acquired in the introduction of the MANUFACTURE OF GENUINE MEERSCHAUM GOODS into this country.

We call Pipes and Cigar-Holders of any shape or design, mount them, do repairing, boiling, and polishing. Also, Amber Work done. And, main of all, do not charge exorbitant prices. For reference, we are in possession of commendations from thousands of our customers, representing all classes of society.

THE RESULT IN VIRGINIA.

THE recent most difficult question seems to be, who won in the Virginia election? The contest was nominally between Conservative and Radical Republicans—that is, between the advocates of general amnesty and suffrage and the friends of a more stringent policy. The result was that the candidate who is a Democrat, who was supported by the Democrats, the late rebels, and some of the Republicans, was elected. It is not denied that the bulk of his vote was Democratic and rebel, that Republican votes would not have elected him, and that the Legislature which is elected with him and in no sense is called Republican. And yet, virtually, the question submitted at the election was a Republican alternative; it was the Republican Constitution in its most prospective form, or the same instrument with the chief points of the reconstruction policy.

The result seems to be, therefore, that the late rebels voted for their own amnesty and for the enfranchisement of the colored citizens, and, indirectly, for the Fifteenth Amendment. Nominally, the result is that Republican. But the anomaly of the situation is that it is a Republican victory won by its enemies. It is in Virginia that the Democratic party, by compulsion, eats its own words that this is a white man's government. Now it certainly makes a great difference whether a radical reform is carried by its friends or its enemies; because, in the latter case, it may justly be suspected that, having carried it to obtain power, they will use the power to repeal it. In the present case, however, this is impossible. Unless the Fifteenth Amendment be ratified by the Legislature, the situation reverts to that before the election. If, however, it be ratified equal suffrage is secure.

This indeed is the view taken by a Democrat who writes to the World in the true Democratic strain. It is a signal illustration of the character of the victory that it is obtained even by the assistance of such gentle malignants.

"The first thing to be noted is, that the Underwood Constitution, in its modified form, but still very objectionable, has been adopted by a majority of not less than sixty thousand votes. True, the obnoxious instrument has been purged of its most proscriptive features, but none now it has characteristics that would damn it in any State that has not been broken on the wheel of Reconstruction. In the first place, we have had no short-cut way, bold out or sure, to get rid of the black dove of negro suffrage. There is no doubt about that, for it is still more distasteful than ever. So we will never get the drug out of our system. It only remains for us to console the creatures whom we have given the right to vote, and to see every effort to make them keep in the path in which we would have them to go."

Of course persons like this correspondent will do all that they can to thwart the free exercise of their newly-won rights by the colored citizens, and their spirit was plainly exhibited last summer by Mr. WADE HAMPTON and others. But this is unavoidable.

The spirit of the new GOVERNOR WALKER, as displayed in his speech after election, was admirable. He appeared beneath the National and State flags, bid respectively by a colored and a white voter. He said that he and his friends must remember that they had succeeded on the platform of universal suffrage and equal rights; and must see that those who opposed them have all their rights and are fully protected by the law. The opportunity of the victory came from the liberality of the Federal Union, and its fruits must be for all. These are certainly very sensible words; and all that is said of GOVERNOR WALKER justifies the belief that they are as sincere as they are wise.

But the malignant—for the word, although originally applied to the Puritan forefathers of us of the radical persuasion, seems peculiarly appropriate in this instance—who writes to the World speaks with evident satisfaction of what he calls the "Conservative" Legislature. "Some of the abominations of the new Constitution in his eyes is that colored voters may also hold certain offices." Happily, however, he remarks this wise and patriotic citizen, who immediately proceeds to sniff at radical "gerrymandering"—happily, however, "with a Conservative Legislature these offices may be made so unprofitable that it will not pay the negroes to accept them. He is pleased to remark also that as the Legislature "the Conservative strength is sufficient to overrule the Governor's veto should he ever 'go back' upon the party that put him in power." But GOVERNOR WALKER will probably remember that if the political element be taken from the party that put him in power and added to the side of its natural sympathy, this "Conservatism" would be a mere minority. His little speech shows him to be too wise a man to believe that the political future of the State is with this bitterly reactionary spirit. It is with a larger liberty, a more enlightened justice, a general intelligence. Let him trust the tendency that has made the bitterest Democrats unwillingly vote for the equality of rights which is so abhorrent to them.

Moreover, as the principles of a national party must be the same in every State, we shall of course hear no more of the natural inferiority of one class of citizens, nor of the sublime creed of color as evidence of political capacity. Any such declaration would denounce the worthy Virginia "Conservatives" who have "swallowed the black dose." There are still doubts and perplexities, but Virginia has decided to equalize the suffrage, to admit colored citizens to office, to educate all the colored children, to forbid the disfranchisement of colored voters; it has elected a Governor who declares that all this must be honestly done, and the World salutes it as a famous Democratic victory! When your gun has a new stock, and barrel, is it your old gun or a new one?

A PROTESTED WORD.

THE news from France is amusing. The Emperor grants certain concessions motu proprio—of his own will. He is reported to have said: "The elections are near, and I must choose between empire and revolution. I will give full satisfaction to the liberal aspirations of all parties; but have decided to cease concessions at the boundaries prescribed by the Constitution." The message to the Legislative body proposes to allow it to elect its own officers, to vote in the closet of the ballot, and to extend the right of interpellation, or of inquiry into executive action. This, it is asserted, amounts practically to the concession of ministerial responsibility as an element of Imperial government.

The story of the Grand Remonstrance in England is very familiar. The King promised what he felt obliged to promise, and broke his word when he thought he could break it with safety. One oath, or promise, or pledge of LOUIS NAPOLEON is not to be broken in another. He talks of the limits of the Constitution. But the Constitution is his work, and it is what he chooses to consider it. He has taken an oath to support it, did he not also take an oath to support the Constitution under which he was placed in the Elysée as President? The word of LOUIS NAPOLEON does not inspire confidence; is that word all the security he can offer France for larger liberty?

What he proposes is merely the old charter with different details. A man of his antecedents is not and will not be a constitutional monarch in the ordinary sense. He will govern as well as reign. He has, indeed, been for a popular trust. He speaks of powers explicitly confided to him by the people. But who forgets the facts? Sworn to obey a constitution, he forcibly overthrew it; imprisoned those it established; imprisoned the Legislature; expelled his fellow-citizens at his pleasure; occupied Paris with the army of the whole France; and, having shown himself absolute master, asked Frenchmen whether he should be Emperor. They said yes; and in this manner were powers virtually conferred on him. Frenchmen have begun to change their minds, and his prestige is waning. But it needs a new revolution to give LOUIS NAPOLEON to give France real liberty at the expense of his crown and dynasty.

THE "ALABAMA" QUESTION POSTPONED.

IN the report of the speech of Mr. GLADSTONE announcing the definite postponement of the Alabama question the remark is made by him that the Government of the United States did not regard the failure of the treaty as a definite stopping of the question, but as the country that it considered it better an interval should occur on account of the state of public opinion in America, before negotiations were resumed; and in this opinion the British Government was inclined to concur. The question was accordingly postponed.

This result is unfortunate, because the indefinite postponement of the discussion merely, but of the negotiation; and it would certainly be better that when Congress meets a treaty should have been submitted, and its readiness to be laid before the Senate, than that there should be a war in debate and lofty resolutions, as seems unready will be, to perplex the settlement of the question. Nor is there any doubt the English press receives the postponement reassuring. The Times observes that "when Mr. MOTLEY consults Mr. SUMNER he will find that such that a treaty consistent with the honor of England will satisfy Americans, he may address the Government for a renewal of negotiations." The suspicion that the Government wishes to dishonor England by a treaty is certainly not receiving to a candid interpretation of any proposition. The Times further says that the question of the Queen's neutrality proclamation will be tacitly abandoned. But this is a vital element of the question. It is moral evidence that can not be set aside. Undoubtedly the issuing of such a proclamation is a right reserved under the law of nations to every government; but undoubtedly, also, the manner in which the right is exercised is indicative of the spirit of the government. Why is it that the escape of a Confederate expedition from New York does not accuse the United States Government of bad faith toward an ally, while that of the Alabama from Liverpool filled this country and all the friends of this country in England with indignation? The answer to this question involves the reason why the Queen's proclamation, which was undoubtedly discretionary with her Government, is a cardinal consideration in the discussion.

The Star also rejoices that the debate is postponed. It is of opinion that American resentment against England is likely to become weaker and her desire to reduce the burden of the debt stronger. If the Star had a more intimate knowledge of the political situation in this country it would think otherwise. Indeed, as a general principle nothing is gained between two countries in which there is a deep feeling of hostility by leaving an angry question unsettled; and that for the very obvious reason that it furnishes an irresistible political opportunity. If the situation remains unchanged until the meeting of Congress, the Star will find that the discussion of the question will not be postponed in that body, and General BANKS, or some other honorable gentleman, will be ready with stringent resolutions, ready, and patriotic ardor will be kindled to the highest practicable point. However the minimum duration may be decided, the question will be pressed. If the Republicans succeed, the Democrats in Congress will act in sympathy with Mr. RYLAND'S resolution in the California Democratic convention, that the Democratic party alone has always proved faithful to the country upon such issues. If the Democrats succeed, they will raise a very string of popular feeling to strengthen themselves for the national campaign, while the Republicans will feel a greater necessity of raising some rallying cry of enthusiasm in action.

Meanwhile the duty of good citizens is to inform themselves thoroughly upon the subject, and public opinion may intelligently guide and not mislead Congress, nor be unduly influenced by Congressional harangues and resolutions. President WOOLSEY truly observes, that it is unwise to raise the question of general international friendliness with that of damages by the Alabama; but the question of general unfriendliness very seriously affects the point which he proceeds to be discussed, namely, whether due precautions were taken to prevent her escape.

SECTARIAN SCHOOLS.

IT is remarkable that while the Roman Catholic ecclesiastics in this country, assisted by the Democratic party in the State, are trying to establish sectarian schools, in Bavaria, a particularly priest-ridden country, the people have recently voted by great majorities against the introduction of ecclesiastical interest, indeed, both Protestant and Roman, warmly advocates the sectarian plan; but such are the feeling and conviction of the people that in one town Protestants, Catholics, and Jews all voted against the sectarianism except one Protestant and one Catholic. In Austria, as we have formerly stated, the Government has decided to organize the schools without ecclesiastical influence of any kind.

The reason for this action, both of the people and of the rulers, is obvious. The aim of the priesthood every where is to obtain as absolute control of the people as possible. It wishes to power to be felt in every relation of life. Its object is to produce the feeling that every important movement and event and institution must have, not a religious sanction, but ecclesiastical approval. Its purpose in obtaining control of the schools is not the education of the people, it is the confirmation and extension of its own power. It wishes to appoint teachers, that it may put its creatures into place. It would prescribe text-books, so as to exclude what it calls heresy; that is to say, whatever tends to establish political and moral liberty. Science threatens certain ecclesiastical traditions and dogmas, and ecclesiasticism would therefore naturally oppose it. The great aim of the priesthood is to identify it in the popular mind religion and the Church; and to cultivate the conviction that the word of the priest is of the Church and the voice of religion.

The experience of mankind fortunately pleads against this purpose. Just in the degree that intellectual liberty is secured, the ecclesiastical hold upon the human mind is relaxed. With every fresh ray of light comes the stronger desire for more light, and a more instinctive resistance to the power of darkness. Consequently the universal popular tendency in this time of increasing liberty is to shake off ecclesiastical domination; and where the opportunity is offered the people as resolutely protect against it as the ecclesiastical power insists upon it. This explains the movement in Bavaria, in Austria, and in Hindostan.

The apparent growth of this domination in this country, and especially in this State, is easily enough explained. The enormous immigration, and especially again the part that remains in this State and city, has been chiefly of adherents of the Roman Church, and political purposes are ever pandering to the influence and power of that Church. The support of the Democratic party to the sectarian school scheme of the priesthood is a bid for "the Irish vote," and has no other significance, although it may produce very disagreeable consequences. If the "Irish voters" were not so many in the city of New York, and if they were not generally Roman Catholics, of course we should not see indefinite municipal leases of valuable property at a dollar a year, nor would a Catholic mob feel emboldened to assault at Orange procession in the streets on the anniversary of the Boyne.

To control the schools, to appoint teachers, to choose text-books, and at the expense of the state, is to master the very sources of influence. As we have before said, the mere contact of a Catholic with Protestant children is disheartening. The little Catholics see as much intelligence, good conduct, confidence, happiness outside their Church as within its pale. The result is inevitable; and therefore the first step is most strenuously resisted by the ecclesiastical influence. It is a subject which deserves the most thoughtful consideration among intelligent persons in this country; and the tendency that is so perceptible in this State as to be called a policy is one of the strong reasons for opposing the Democratic ascendency. That party can not, with any hope of success, displease its members of this faith, as formerly the party at large could not displease the slavery interest. And as its old national policy was dictated by that interest, so its policy upon the subject of sectarian education in this State will be dictated by the ecclesiastical leaders of the voters whom it must propitiate.

ENFORCEMENT OF THE USURY LAW.

ALTHOUGH it is made the express duty of courts of justice to charge each Grand Jury especially to inquire into violations of the usury laws, and the courts very regularly perform it, yet no indictments have been found, and the statute has remained a dead letter for years, until the late meeting of the Grand Jury in this city. The offense of receiving, directly or indirectly, any "greater interest, discount, or consideration" for the loan or forbearance of any money, goods, or things in action than seven per cent. per annum is declared to be a "misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof the person so offending shall be punished by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both."

The immunity from punishment enjoyed by those who have constantly accepted usurious interest—perhaps in entire ignorance of the statute—has been very suddenly disturbed, owing, it is said, to the wants of some of the Erie clique, who are thought to have an influence over the composition and movements of the Grand Jury.

In the summer of 1868, when the money market was tightened by operators in Erie, the Grand Jury was not only not invoked, but it would have been hushed into silence had some curious investigators then unburied the statute and brought the offenses before that tribunal.

The sympathy with crime which is shown by many public officials does not embrace offenses committed by the class which has lately been indicted, and it may be that this obsolete statute may be employed in such cases, and especially when the offense consists in satisfying the pressing wants, at the market rate, of those who lately have been loaded with too much stock for the time of extreme pressure.

It is unquestionably the duty of courts and juries to enforce the laws, not capriciously and by spasmodic energy, but constantly and because they are in force and ought to be obeyed. They constitute a snare when they are allowed to lie dormant for years and are raked up to gratify sinister objects.

There would be no objection to the repeal of usury laws if the right to make the income of ordinary investments were as free as the industry by which gold and silver may be obtained from the earth for this purpose. It is true that the precious metals may not be coined except by the general government, but the trade may practically free and unrestricted. But as the money of circulation may not be issued except under special authority, it would seem to be necessary to foster a privilege which is few only enjoy by restricting the rate of interest which may be claimed by them, so as to prevent oppression. The case as between paper-money issued by a few and that fabricated from gold and silver which every one may have freely coined, is very different, and it is from the failure to see the distinction that much of the confusion as to the policy of usury laws may be traced.

The argument in favor of absolute freedom in loaning money, based upon the supposed freedom with which money is created and supplied, fails except in its application to gold and silver money; but as this has been practically demonetized in parts of the United States, and an artificial system substituted, the safeguards which belong to an artificial system would seem to be necessary.

The severity of punishment provided by the statute is disproportioned to the offense, and the statute in this respect needs alteration, at least so far as dealers are concerned who are not connected with banks nor acting under their authority. The penalty of the loss of the excess of interest would seem to be sufficient in ordinary cases.

But while the statute remains unrepealed no prudent man will expose himself to its provisions, for the law may be appealed to when least expected in behalf of unscrupulous speculators, with a view to alarm those who take an unlawful rate, and create the ease in money which on a turn of events they will depreciate, employing then all the advantages which the change confers.

THE DEMOCRATIC PROGRAMME.

THE late Democratic Conventions have thoroughly rediscovered those who supposed that the leopard would suddenly change his spots. More amusing and even ridiculous spectacles have seldom been presented to public attention; ridiculous, because there is always something absurd in the incessant reiteration of offers that are perpetually rejected. The only alleviation of the old order is the nomination of General ROSECRANS for Governor of Ohio. That, as if to extinguish any hope that might begin to glimmer in consequence, Mr. WALLACE, the Chairman of the Pennsylvania Convention, in calling it to order, remarked that principles, not men, are the Democratic doctrine. That, indeed, was evident at Columbus, as it was at Chicago in 1864. Then the man was one who had been a Union soldier—the principles were surrender to the rebellion. Now the man is ROSECRANS—the principles are "Copperhead." And as Mr. WALLACE truly remarked, principles, not men, are the Democratic doctrine. Those who are not Democrats, however, are expected to take solely at the man. Republicans in Ohio, for instance, are respectfully requested to contemplate the Union uniform of ROSECRANS while they give their votes to VALLANDIGHAM.

But with this exception the men and the principles are equally familiar. VALLANDIGHAM is lauded in Pennsylvania by Mr. ASA PACKER, Mr. HUGHES, and Mr. ASA PACKER, the candidate for Governor, are the same old Copperhead managers who conducted the business during the war. They told us then that the Government was a dark despotism because it would not let other brethren depart in peace; now they tell us it is a dark despotism because it will not let them stay upon their own terms—the Government being the people of the country. Then we were being taxed to immolate our brethren; now we are taxed to pamper bloated bond-holders, who are not our brethren, probably, because they sustained the war. Then the negro was an inferior, and this was a white man's government; now also the negro is an inferior, and still it is a white man's government. Then the local rights of States were ruthlessly invaded; now the local rights of States shall never be overthrown. In fine, now as then, in the estimation of the old Democratic managers, all is tyranny, corruption, and black despair, and universal night is at hand, unless—ah! unless—Mr. VALLANDIGHAM and his friends are permitted to direct the taxation, to handle the money, and to control the Government; in which happy case Astræa will return to earth, and the hopes of mankind may revive.

There were those who supposed that this party might have learned something; that inasmuch as the country had decided that the national debt should be kept, and that all honest citizens should vote and be no longer ostracized, those issues would have been relinquished and battle ordered upon other and more promising grounds. There were those who believed that those who advised this course, who recommended it last year, and who had the emphasis of rueful experience to support their counsel, would have the confidence of honorable and patriotic men, its late candidate for Vice-President, General BRADY, extols rebels at a social meeting of faithful Union soldiers.

And all this denunciation of equal rights, and praising of rebels, and demand for repudiation and dishonor, is put forth under the guise of "Conservatism;" as in the bitter hours of the war, during the tortures of Andersonville and the horrors of the battle-field, it was "Conservatism" to palliate the rebellion and to sneer at the Government. Is there any thing in the character of those who manage these conventions, or of the principles which they proclaim, which should persuade an honest and loyal American citizen that the just results of the war will be more respected, or life and property more honestly and economically administered, or the public honor and peace more surely maintained by the Democratic party than by the Republican? If, indeed, that party had abandoned all its defeated issues and repudiated the managers identified with all its ignominies—if it had declared its acceptance of the situation, nominated men whose careers and characters were their credentials, and with such pledges of a changed spirit had challenged public confidence, there would be circumstances in the situation, as there always are when a party has been long in power, that might have inclined that public confidence toward it, unless the dominant party by its practice as well as its profession had indicated its claim to continued success. But the opportunity has been lost; and therefore the triumph of such a party with such a platform would be not only a defeat but a national disgrace.

MEN AND WOMEN IN CONVENTION.

THE late WOMAN'S Suffrage Convention at Saratoga was but another indication of the fact that this movement will not be pushed or frowned down. Indeed, while many persons are not attracted, but rather repelled, by some of the public aspects of the agitation, it is privately making rapid inroads upon the old traditions; and the simultaneous appearance of Mr. MILL'S book in England and Dr. BUSHNELL'S in this country shows how deeply it engages the attention of the most thoughtful minds. The phrase "woman's rights" reform seems to many repugnant to good taste; but reforms in their beginnings are not apt to propitiate what is called taste, and they are always distasteful to those who are in order to remain undisturbed. The Reform agitation of 1832 in England was excessively distasteful to the Lords and the Bishops, and the Anti-Slavery agitation was singularly wanting in good breeding, in the judgment of the Protectionists; the Anti-Slavery agitation was angrily outlawed from polite society in this country; and the Woman's Suffrage movement is summarily declared absurd by those who do not favor it.

The old answer to the ridicule current in the superior smile at "strong-minded" women—in the humorous allusion to the spectacles and umbrella of a typical and redoubtable "bloomer," in the tech clever clack of the word "6," and the excellent fun of the descriptions of men officiating as nurses and washers and ironers, is but perhaps spent force. Not long ago it was a little stale whenever it appears, and at any moment has palpably failed; and this for the reason that we have already stated, namely, that the question of woman's rights seems to many, and who are not persuaded by a joke because they laugh at it. Even the Tribune, which keeps up rather a jocular banter of the old style, occasionally falls back upon what it evidently considers a serious argument—a double-header, as the boys say on the Fourth of July—"in such clever clack of the word '6,'"

LIME ROCK ISLAND, OFF NEWPORT, RHODE ISLAND.—[SKETCHED BY C. G. BUSH.]

IDA LEWIS,

THE NEWPORT HEROINE.

THE Newport "Grace Darling" was born in the city of Newport, Rhode Island, in the year 1842. Her father, Captain HOSEA LEWIS, was appointed keeper of the Lime Rock Light in 1854. It is located upon a rock covering a few hundred square feet of space, at the southern entrance of Newport Harbor, and is entirely surrounded by water. Hence the only means of communication with the land is by a boat. Soon after the appointment of Mr. LEWIS a small dwelling-house was erected on the rock, and his family took possession thereof in 1858. Mr. LEWIS was paralyzed about eight years ago, and since that time has been almost a helpless cripple. His wife has since been obliged to give most of her time to caring for the light and keeping it in order, while IDA, the eldest of four children, has looked after the family, transported her brothers and sisters to and from Newport almost daily, for the purpose of attending school, and aided in supporting the family.

She first distinguished herself as a rescuer of human life in the same year that she went with the family to reside in the light-house. Four lads, who were in a small boat, were upset, and were in imminent danger of perishing, when IDA, discovering their situation, put off in her boat, and succeeded in picking them all up and restoring them to consciousness.

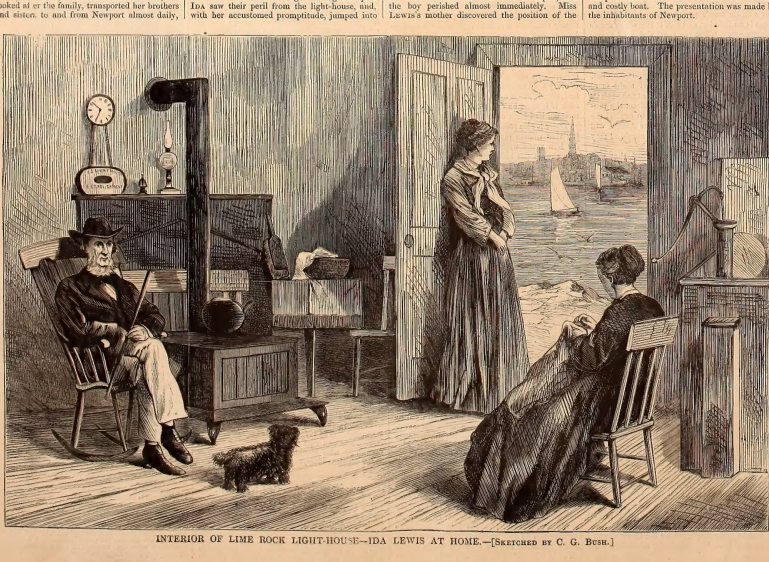
In the winter of 1866, on one of the coldest days ever known in this latitude, IDA rescued a soldier who had endeavored to have a sail in a frail skiff. It was a most daring feat, and required courage and perseverance such as few of the male sex even are possessed of.

During the prevalence of a gale in the fall of 1867, two men, who had lost a valuable sheep overboard, while searching for the animal, found themselves in imminent danger of being swamped. IDA saw their peril from the light-house, and, with her accustomed promptitude, jumped into her boat and went to their rescue. After landing them safely on shore, she returned and saved the sheep also.

Soon after the above, on one stormy, cold night, a boatman whose craft was disabled took refuge on an isolated rock half a mile distant from IDA'S dwelling. Finding himself in danger of perishing from cold, he shouted for help, and his cries being heard, IDA started out promptly and added to her previous bright record by the rescue of another imperiled life.

Miss LEWIS'S last and crowning act of heroism was the rescue from drowning of two soldiers on Monday, the 29th of March, 1869. She was quite unwell at the time, suffering from a severe cold. The soldiers had started from Newport for Fort Adams in a small boat under the guidance of a boy who professed to be capable of managing it. They had proceeded about half the distance when the boat was swamped, and the boy perished almost immediately. Miss LEWIS'S mother discovered the position of the soldiers, who were clinging to the boat in an almost exhausted condition. She immediately reported the fact to her daughter, and the latter rushed out without covering either on her head or feet, save a pair of stockings, and jumping into the boat she called to her younger brother to go with and aid her. A fearful gale was raging at the time, and the management of a boat was extremely difficult, even to an experienced oarswoman like IDA. Nevertheless, the feat was accomplished, the men were dragged into the boat and taken to the light-house, one of them being so much exhausted as to require much hard work before he could be restored to consciousness.

Miss LEWIS has received a handsome gold watch from the two young soldiers. On July 5 one of the most interesting features of the celebration of Independence Day at Newport was the presentation to Miss LEWIS of a beautiful and costly boat. The presentation was made by the inhabitants of Newport.



INTERIOR OF LIME ROCK LIGHT-HOUSE—IDA LEWIS AT HOME.—[SKETCHED BY C. G. BUSH.]

IN THE HEART OF THE EARTH.

I THINK we created some excitement at Falmouth. Unconventional in our attire, merry in our deportment, excited in our demeanor, and altogether imbued with that excellent Mark Tapleian philosophy of being "jolly under any circumstances," it is small wonder that we did create some excitement at Falmouth. We have none of us a word to say against Falmouth—a charming, health-giving, and delightful spot, in the most beautiful of all English counties, Cornwall—indeed, we are all of us inclined to mark with a white stone the day that the Falmouth expedition was proposed in a certain smoking-room, of which history knoweth not, but individuals a very great deal. The little army that invaded the place of which I am speaking, where the sea is of the bluest and the harbor of the grandest description, was mixed in its tastes, talent, and temper. In this consisted our jollity. We gave and took; smothered our absurdities; advertised our excellences; offended no one, and seldom laid ourselves open to giving offense. I am not egotistical, for I am speaking of the party in its collective form. We behaved prettily on all occasions. It was too hot to put ourselves out of temper, and the society too pleasant to suggest boredom. If young Cecil, the budding poet, chose to read Tennyson's Idyls—backed up most strongly by Isoline Langworthy, with the fair hair and blue eyes—on the pleasant cliff underneath the castle, we raised no objection. Those who cared to hear Cecil spout listened; and those who detested poetry went to sleep. If the famous Farquharson, briefless barrister, orator, and sucking politician, chose to discuss Mr. John Stuart Mill and the female franchise, women's rights, and the rest of it—backed up most strongly by Maude Carruthers, with the raven hair and olive complexion—we allowed him to rap his knuckles on the table, and talk us into a semi-idiotic state of stupor. If Harry Armstrong found delight in bringing his London manners into Cornwall, and preferred the society of a certain soft-eyed little divinity who sold newspapers and gum-arabic in the town to our sweet society, we allowed him to make excuses for deserting us, and, with the exception of a little innocent and unavoidable "chaff," he was free to "spoon" all day in the stationer's shop for aught we cared. We excused Lilian Corner's scales and morning exercises for the sake of her Heller, Hiller, Schubert, and Chopin; her tarantellas, moonlight sonatas, and reveries, with which we were favored in the evening if we behaved ourselves very prettily. The "irrepressible Edgar," as we used to call the youngest male member of our community, was allowed to give full vent to his overflowing spirits all day long, provided he woke us betimes in the morning to get our matutinal plunge in the blue waters that curled themselves refreshingly into "Summer Cove." And what of our host and hostess? Theirs indeed was a rule of love; and as they allowed us to do exactly as we liked, we were the more considerate in meeting their wishes and pulling all together.

We had vainly imagined that we had seen every thing worth seeing in the environs of Falmouth, and enjoyed ourselves as much as is consistent with human nature, when our party received a valuable addition. A certain sweet songstress of whom the world has heard, and of whom the world will ere long hear a great deal more, came down among us to breathe her native air, and get new inspirations and health from the woods and caverns, and rocks and sea-music, with which we were surrounded.

But the songstress did not come alone. She brought her sweet voice and all our old pet songs; the songs set to words which were poetry, and the words wedded to music which breathed of love, and was therefore quite unsalable; she brought her cheery manner and her indomitable pluck—she has been in the saddle during the late American campaign for days and days, has this sweet songstress of mine—and she brought her brother.

Her brother was such a good fellow that I must really introduce him with a little bit of a preface. He was, if I may make use of an expression, most puzzling at school, and most useful in after-life—a walking oxymoron. He was an Englishman, and not an Englishman. An Englishman he was in heart, and speech, and bearing; but destiny had stolen him away from his native land years ago, to shed his cheeriness on other climes.

So much, however, did he love the old country that once in every three or four years he wended his way back again—the lucky swallow!—his pockets full of gold, and his heart full of love, to spend a holiday in England and a little fortune in generosity.

During these holiday trips he never left his sister or his parents; and as his sister and his parents had chosen to run down to Falmouth, like a dutiful fellow, Washington followed them thither.

We were at breakfast when Washington burst in upon us at Falmouth; and breakfast at Falmouth was not such an early meal as it might have been. With that generosity and unselfishness which is characteristic of Englishmen, I will at once exculpate the whole male portion of our party.

The irrepressible Edgar was bound to wake us in the morning; and we were always on our backs in the sea by eight o'clock. But the women! oh, those dear women! Well, generally speaking, we had but little to complain of. They were cheerful, and bore the fatigue which strong-legged men not unfrequently impose upon fragile women without a murmur; but they were not proof against the mightily exercise of that highly necessary, but eminently female organ, the human tongue! At ten o'clock deceptive yawns were chorused forth, to take us off our guard, and persuade us to allow them to go to bed.

NO THOROUGHFARE.

Not an objection was urged. The poet perhaps looked somewhat more lachrymose than usual, and the orator came to a dead stop in an able harangue on the "Female Franchise;" but Laurine's hand was squeezed by the poet, and Maude's eyes followed by the orator, without another murmur at ten o'clock.

I am bound to confess that I don't altogether consider that the poet or the orator were quite fairly treated. Ten minutes after Isabine and Maude had disappeared in a hurry of farewells, one another in feats of agility and fancy; they talls, they do one another's hair, they do my thing but that for which they left the society of males—go to sleep!

The consequence is that, having devoted the freshest part of the night to folly, they have to devote the smallest part of the night to sleep. And when the morning comes the great hungry men, ravenous from fresh air and salt-water, have to fling pebbles and sand and gravel up at the windows in the upper regions, from which the tantalizing ones will never emerge.

And so it came about that Washington found us at breakfast at an unorthodox hour, and not all got sentimentally chaffed. We very soon saw that there were to be no half-measures with Washington. He did not saunter about in the grass to grow under his feet. His stay in England was limited, and that which had to be done was evidently to be "done quickly."

I must say that, up to the time of Washington's arrival, we had not made the most of our time. The last smoking-room on the night the expedition had been arranged, all sorts of excursions and drives, and picnics and sails, had been mapped out.

But once at Falmouth, we dreamed away our time. It was very pleasant. We lathed and breakfasted, and lathed till lunch, and lounged till dinner, and sang and strolled till tea, and lathed till bedtime; and so day after day slipped away, and Washington found us at breakfast prepared for another day's dream.

I suppose we wanted a leader. Energy—that is to say, personal energy—was out of the question. Washington assumed the vacant directorate and led us. It was a case of "Othama! Othama! stramonge precedes Washington."

To tell the truth, it was Washington who permanded me to be at the heart of the earth.

He did not begin rashly or impetuously. He did not frighten me with an accurate description of the "man-engine" and the "bucket," and the interminable ladders; but in a light and airy way—before all the girls, by the way—he led the conversation gently up to mines and mining adventures. He told us how the Prince of Wales and a talented contributor to Punch had been down the Botallack; and then taking stock of me, after a preliminary examination of my hands and a general examination of other muscular developments, he asked me how I should like to be introduced to the Wheal Isabel.

"Of all things in the world," I said, "if provided she be young and good-looking. But why Wheal? Is it a spot of endurement or a feeling of respect? Am I to understand from the mysterious word Wheal that Isabel is a Cornish Countess, or a Grey Queen? Introduce me to the Wheal Isabel? Certainly! Wheal or wa Isabel, could any thing unfortunate be sprung upon such a charming appellation?"

"Hold hard!" he said; "this Cornish air of ours has filled you full of conceit. Entertain your author, Isabel is not an enchanting maiden fashioned by your poetical imagination. She is no gauzy-winged sprite, no maid of Orgelus, no naiad or mermaiden, no Cornish beauty. She is black, deep, dirty, and terrible. She will cause you a ton of work, trouble, fatigue, and some little expense; but the Wheal Isabel is worth knowing.

"In Heaven's name, then," said I, "who or what is she?"

"The Wheal Isabel," said he, "is one of the largest mines in this magnificent district; and if you would like to be introduced to her you shall."

"Coal?" said I, shuddering.

"Or tin?" echoed the maculagnous Armstrong.

"Gold, no doubt," whispered Isaline in my ear.

"Nonsense," said Washington; "copper."

I very soon saw that at this very early period of the entertainment there was no getting out of an introduction to the Wheal Isabel.

The curiosity of the women was fairly aroused. And that was quite enough.

In an instant the programme was mapped out entirely to the satisfaction of the girls. We were all to ride over to the Wheal Isabel under the management of Washington; and it was to be the unhappy victim sacrificed on the copper altar.

Friend Washington, who at one time had been all cockalorum about the dangers and daring of the expedition, got out of it, or rather of the fainting part of it, with that intrepidity and indifference peculiar to leaders of expeditions.

"You know, my dear fellow, I have seen these kind of things so often before that it is really hardly worth while the trouble of changing one's clothes for it," said he, with that charming tone of superiority which is so refreshing to the man who knows that he is about to make a fool of himself for the benefit of his fellow-creatures. "But I would advise you to go down," he added, suspicious that I would back out of it at the last moment. "It will never regret it."

And then he cleverly magnified me into a hero, whereat the girls said pretty and complimentary things, and the expedition was finally arranged. Our cavalcade was not altogether pretty to look at, but I think it may be safely termed a good one to go. Falmouth was not great in saddle-horses.

We had a 'bus-horse, a hearse-horse, a flyhorse, a coach-horse, and a broken pommel. With these excellent assistants to a ten-mile ride along the Cornish roads, we started, much laughter of parents and cheering of neighboring butcher-boys, on our journey to the Wheal Isabel.

Very black and barren grew the land as we neared the Queen of Copperdom. The trees somehow or other left off growing; the hills seemed sown with ashes instead of grass; tall chimneys emitted huge volumes of smoke, and deserted cottages, with broken, and grimy-looking monsters met us at every turn.

When four cross roads met amidst a labyrinth of shafts and engine-houses in the centre of a blackened heath we drew rein.

"I think this must be the place," said Washington. He was right. A distant Cornishman came out to meet us, and to him we presented our credentials, addressed to the Captain of the Mine.

The captain was somewhat disappointed, I think, when he found that we were not all to be indoctrinated into the mysteries of mining. Miners are after all but men, and the laughing merriment of our joyous girl-friends already won over the rough heart of the honest miner.

"No, it is only this gentleman," said the treacherous Washington, pointing to me, "who is supposed again. "I have been down mines scores of times."

This was all very well of Washington, vaunting his superiority in this way; but why should he, by implication, assert that I was a fool because I was a novice, and because I had not been down a mine?

I was quite prepared to go through all the dirty work, but I wanted to be thought a hero, not a jackass.

The girls stood by me bravely. Their sympathy relieved me from some of the humiliation I felt; and they seemed determined, at all events, that I should not go down into the heart of the earth without a cheer.

I was handed over to the tender mercies of a sub-captain, who hinted that it would be as well if two other miners were first off as a sort of escort, to guard me through the lower regions.

"It's as well to have two or three with you, Sir," said he: "they tend to inspire with more respect down below, and they're a rough lot, I can tell you."

I scented, of course. At such a time it would, by no manner of means, be politic to dissend from my thing or my body.

For the next hour or so my life was in the hands of the slaves of the Wheal Isabel.

The sub-captain led me into a little outhouse, where he personally superintended my toilet. I had imagined that it would merely be necessary to put a pea-jacket over me and a tarpaulin on my clothes. But I was very soon disabused of this notion.

"We must have every thing off, Sir," said my guide, in a soothing medical tone, as if he were about to operate on me. "It's an awfully dirty place down there."

The costume will bear description. I was first encased in flannel, clean, of course; and over that was placed an old cay-coloured suit of my miner's suit. My feet were wrapped in two flannel dusters and then thrust into a pair of old miner's shoes, which too big for my feet. These and I were placed a very stiff billy-cock hat, literally as hard as iron, smeared with yellow grease. On the front of this I was told to fasten a lump of clay, and into this he stuck a farthing rush-light. About half a dozen more rush-lights were then procured ready for action.

On our way across the open to the hut in which our party was resting, my attendant asked me which way I intended to go down. Asked me, indeed! as if I knew any thing about the matter. Looking about. I was only anxious not to look a fool, and to do exactly what I was told. I must even say that I felt a pardonable pride in his hands.

"Will you go down," said he, "by the ladders, or by the bucket, or by the man-engine?"

He might just as well have asked me the Hindostance for Wheal Isabel.

"The ladders," said he, by way of explanation, "are the most tiring, and the most tedious. You will take a good hour to get down by the ladders. The bucket is a dirty way of going down; besides, in this case, I am said alone for bringing up the rubble and the ore, and any interference with this arrangements stops the working of the mine. The man-engine is by all the quickest way, and it is the way all the men here go down. Would you like to try it?" and then he added, looking at me, "but you must be very careful."

This was the first suggestion that had been made to me that there was any danger in my undertaking. Now the principle of the bucket and the ladder I understood perfectly well, but I had no more idea what a man-engine was than the man in the moon. My mentor, for some mysterious reason, did not like to say directly precisely the superior advantage of the man-engine. And so I consented. If I had only known then, at that quiet moment, away from the laughing girls and the heroic Washington, what I was undertaking, and the mortal agony I was about to endure, my prudence would have probably have got the better of my pride, and I should have been whizzed quietly down in the dirty bucket.

But as it was, in my ignorance and in the innocence of my heart, I decided for the man-engine; and in a minute more I was ushered into the hut.

My quaint appearance was the signal for a loud burst of laughter. Some would "never have known me, would you?" others pronounced me a fright; and my own soft angelic voice declared me to be "a handsome young miner."

"You're sure you are all right?" said the little comforting voice. "Have you had some brandy?"

"All right," said I, feeling very pale. "I should think so. Particularly now."

"But how are you going down?" said the sweet voice; "the captain has been telling us all about it."

"By the man-engine."

"Are you sure, Sir, don't! It's very dangerous if you're not accustomed to it. He told me so."

That tone of entreaty persuaded me more than ever that I would take the most dangerous route. It was very brutal, I know, but at such a time I was looking and feeling like a fool, and I would sooner have died than shown the white feather.

They escorted me toward the infernal machine like a criminal on his road to execution.

"Set it going, Bill," said the sub-captain; and then in a few terse sentences he explained the principle of the thing.

Two parallel horizontal bars provided with iron steps at intervals of about ten yards went down and down and down into the earth. The method of getting down the shaft was by passing from bar to bar, and from step to step, by every means in the world "except" was given. It was essentially requisite to change the moment the word of command was given, and to make no bungle or shuffle about the matter. The engine waited for no man. There was no possibility of calling a halt, and no saying hold to catch one if a spasm was about. Almost a safety rested with one's self. One false step or false clutch at the next rung, and it would have been all over with me, and even in the daylight I bungled a little.

"You must change quicker, Sir," said my guide; "if you don't the rungs knock against you and it will be all up with you."

I was very pale, I know, after the first short practice. I felt that I was doing a mighty act; I know that the men ought to have stopped me; the little voice, now quite trembling, begged me not to go; but my lips said vowed I would not show the white feather.

"Do you think you are all right, Sir?" said my guide. "Will you go? You must decide now finally."

"All right," I said.

And then the bell rang, and down we went. I saw the little face—it was the very last thing I saw—and upon my honor I really and truly believe that I should never see that little face again, except by a miracle.

But there was no time then to think of any thing but my own safety.

That terribly monotonous word "Change" chime ringing out from the dark depths of the shaft, varied by the sub-captain on the next ledge below me. And I knew that my life depended upon my quickness.

Hours, days, years, yes, and centuries seemed to pass between every change. It was like a horrible nightmare. The awful suspense between every word of command; the feeling that something terrible might happen next time; the momentary relief between the darkness of the shaft, the rush of the water, the glimmer of the rush-lights going down; the sad, hollow echo of the captain's voice, the word of command, and exhorting me to be careful, now kindly, now fearfully; all these things combined made up as horrible a dream as it is possible to conceive.

For full five-and-twenty minutes I was in this awful suspense, and in that time went through about five hundred changes.

At last, half blinded with beads of cold perspiration, and nearly dead with fright, I heard the welcome bell, the welcome tone, and I was safe on the first ledge of the mine.

The man-engine went no further, and the rest of the journey had to be accomplished by ladders. I never told the men what I suffered, but in a rough, kindly way I was congratulated on my feat.

"I never thought you would have come, Sir," said one. "It frightens most after the first turn."

"Can't you signal up that we are all safe," said I, thinking about the little face.

"Yes, Sir, to be sure."

And they did.

The signal came back again, "Thank God!" and all the miners took off their hats at the last signal. They are pious fellows, these Cornish miners.

I was quite two hours away from my friends, groping about, now on my hands and knees, now down ladders from ledge to ledge, now in a sloping position, now erect in the dark, mysterious corridors I found in the heart of the earth. It was hot—stifling hot, hotter than the very hottest room in a Turkish bath. But the subtart, half-clad men working away at the ore were so interesting, and the metal sparkled so on the ground, and the scene was so strange and fascinating, that I could not tear myself away.

On and on I went, still forever walking on. I was very thirsty, and would have given any thing for a draught of beer. I had no conception of any kind see found in the heart of the earth. I was allowed, however, to put my mouth to the bunghole of a water-barrel, and very refreshing was the draught.

"You can walk on like this for hours, Sir," said the captain, seeing I was tired, and still determined not to give in.

"Is it pretty much the same?"

"I think you have seen all now," said he. So we went back.

"Which way will you go?" said my guide. I was very tired.

"In the bucket," I said, without any hesitation.

With my pockets laden with copper ore, and in the rough embrace of a stalwart miner—for it was close quarters for two in the bucket—we here swung up to the daylight.

Dash went the bucket against the sides of the shaft, through which the water oozed and trickled and splashed. Daylight and lighter it became, until, at last, I saw above me the clear, blue, cloudless sky; and, half-dazzled with the glaring light, and blinking like an old owl, I arrived safe and sound on terra firma.

They greeted me with another loud peal of laughter, louder and merrier than the last. My appearance was certainly not prepossessing. I was covered with red mud from head to foot, hot, disheveled, wild, and weary. And then "I smelt so puh!" as Hamlet says. However, a refreshing cold bath, a hair-brush, rough towels, and a change of clothes made me presentable; and after an excellent luncheon in the board-room of the owners of the Wheal Isabel, we were all very soon trotting away toward Falmouth.

* * * * * * *

One word more. A brooch made from the copper ore I brought up from the mine rests on the neck of the owner of the little face which is looking at me as I write from a distant corner of the room. Sometimes when I am out of sorts—which is not very often—she says I wake up suddenly from a disturbed dream in my old arm-chair, and fancy somehow that the little face is gone, that there is a strange singing in my ears, and from a dark unearthly vault a voice keeps moaning, "Change."

EVENING.

[FROM THE GERMAN.]

CHILD! let me journey on my way;
It is already cold and late,
The closing of a dreary day,
And I may neither pause nor wait.

Why sing to me? So tenderly,
That mournfully sounds thy notemade song!
What was the word? Love? Love? Ah me!
I had forgotten it so long.

And yet, I think, in days long past,
I think that once that word was sweet!
But now the road is darkening fast,
I go where rest the weary feet.

The darkening road winds sourly on,
And slower flag the steps, and slower;
My early life is dead and gone,
And every hour I feel it more.

FLIRTATION À LA JUDITH.

THERE is a beauty that dazzles at first sight, and afterward shows more and more defective. And there is a beauty to which you are drawn and there is a beauty so subtle that you are not at first sure that it is beauty; a better kind but dangerous, apt to become for a man the one face dangerous, apt to become for a man the one face in the world. Of this order was May Barcarole. A brown-eyed, brown-haired beauty. And for her moral nature generous, haughty, ignorant, sublime. In theory a detester of men; a little twenty-year-old radical, progressively burning to avenge the wrongs of all other women. In fact, a flirt.

This pretty little reformer, with her cousin Betty Blundel, was spending the month of July at the Hermitage. Mrs. Margrave was fond of young people, and the old house was always gay with them. There were a dozen other young men and women, and more were coming, Eversham among the rest. His aunt wrote Mrs. Margrave that she should bring him as her favorite nephew, and that they would be sure to like him.

"Like him!" echoed Mrs. Margrave, laying down the letter with a stately shiver, and every body shivered responsively, and looked at Betty Blundel. Betty turned a greenish yellow and rose. May dropped her netting and rose also. The young ladies looked with indignant sympathy toward the young men. The young men returned commiserating glances. Betty's handkerchief was at her eyes at once, and on seeing it May also left the retreat was not so expeditiously managed but that a sniff or two were heard outside of the door. Betty was a pretty lady of uncertain age and complexion, with no particular eyebrows and expression; but at this moment she was the personification of pathos and excited the deepest interest both in the male and female bosom. Even the waiters had it, and discussed over the joint in the cook and my plate girl in the privacy of the kitchen.

What affair? That is what I find difficulty in explaining. How is one to say such things? In fact, how do such things get to the air? A young lady can not propose to a young man. A young lady can not pay serious attentions to a man. Only a very bold and daring spirit ever does. Margrave's theory, and it was the theory in the Hermitage, and in all the houses that the Hermitage condescended to visit: for Mrs. Margrave ruled with absolute sway. And it was very distinctly understood, in all these localities, that Betty Blondel had been "disappointed" by Eversham. Do you ask in what way disappointed? My dear girl, as lexically speaking, there is but one disappointment for a young lady, and it being clearly understood that Eversham had inflicted this disappointment upon her, it is evident that this young man was a brute and a trifler. That may sound sweeping, but examine the theory and you see at once no other conclusion is possible.

Fancy, then, the flutter when this monster was announced as soon to make his appearance at the Hermitage. On hearing it Betty left the room in the dramatic manner already described, and it is difficult to say whether indignation at the monster's audacity or curiosity about his appearance ruled most strongly at the Hermitage till Eversham's arrival. Then it was discovered that Nature makes benevolent provisions, even for monsters. There was no trace in him of the moral hyena. He was a winning man. His manners were unexceptionable. His composure! Ah, that was sublime! His well-bred self-control was so perfect that it was as good as perfect innocence. He met Betty with an air of amiable indifference; the sharpest scrutiny could not detect the quiver of a muscle. He devoted himself to May at once; under her eyes; before everybody. It is my belief that he went further, and self unsuspected, and that Betty, for her own sake, had given no sign. Otherwise nerves of iron and a brow of brass could not have done it, in my opinion.

And May repulsed him, of course; from him with scorn! She burned him by her eyes and avenged the wrongs of her sex in general, and Miss Blondel in particular, in season and out of season! Thinking of the sort, you know. She listened to him. She smiled on him. She cajoled him. She made bouquets for his button-hole, on the days when he went to church, and fastened them with her own fair hands. She met him in artful muslin toilets on the piazza when he came back. She was seen once on his side at croquet, and cheated under his banner. For his sake she threw over Shafton, and Marcy, the other young beau to her bow, without compunction. It was a flirtation; and the men some-what spitefully declared that it would be more—a match, in which the ladies always win—significantly, as who should say, "We know what we know."

For Eversham—did I not say in the beginning that May's face had dangerous tendency to become the face of all other faces for a young man? "There are many girls and but one Eversham fitted with a suitable number, as became him; but, despite prettiness, May possessed a look that was at once frank and severe. There is one recipe for beauty, girls, and an easy one. If you are true it will redeem you. If you are fair it will make you irresistible, take my word for it. I myself have been three times saved from the snares of a Benedict only by the most small conceit or pettish vanity on the features I admired. But it is of Eversham we are talking; and Eversham had studied the face that he could neither dream nor plan without it. He thought himself also safe in dreaming of it; for Miss Barcarole was a girl who understood herself and the usages of society, and modestly but plainly Miss Barcarole had encouraged him. In this way they had arrived at that delightful delicious but embarrassing—well known to lovers, where conversation becomes an impossibility, and the most promising subject suddens you far beyond the second sentence. Eversham felt that he must speak, but though he had had experiences with women, he was at a loss how to begin.

"I have something to tell you," he commenced, laying his hand lightly on hers, "though it can hardly be new to you."

May started and looked up. There was no mistaking the face bending toward her. Before he had uttered "I love you" she knew what he was about to say, and the smile not only died away from her lips, but she grew awfully pale. Eversham was embarrassed. He had expected that she would blush, or show some signs of confusion. On the contrary, she sat looking at him rigidly and fixedly, like one turned to bronze for a singularly unpleasant duty.

"You must have expected I would tell you this," he repeated, uneasily.

"Yes, I expected it," answered May, mechanically, with the looking straight before her.

"And your answer," urged Eversham, telling himself that he ought to be charmed by such frankness, but secretly, if I must confess it, shocked.

"I have no answer," said May, indifferently.

"No answer!" He no longer thought of criticising her tone or expression. There had come upon him a confusion, sickening confusion of intolerable treachery. Her hend was turned away, but there was no softening in its lines; on the contrary, something like defiance. He thought she felt his look, and grew, if possible, paler yet, she was obstinately silent.

"What do you mean?" he asked, huskily. "What have you intended all this summer?"

"I intended"—The word, for some reason, roused May from her passive defiance, and she turned on him with a cruel smile:

"Why, mean, Mr. Eversham, only to pass the time. The game of flirtation has its risks, as no one should know better than you. Only it is generally the woman who loses, and the man who goes away smiling for another game elsewhere. You will acknowledge that our game has been well played, and if it is your turn to lose, why, you can set it over against some past victory, you know."

And this was the girl whom he had loved, because he found her sweet and true. Eversham felt as if the ground were gaping under his feet; but he was a man of spirit, and with her last word he was ready for her.

"Quite right," he answered, coolly. "And, as you say, the game has been well played—by you. I admit that I was entirely deceived, and, in spite of some past knowledge of women, I really thought you honest and modest."

Then, with a formal bow, he turned into a side path (they had been lounging in the garden), and walked there, sick to the heart, wrathful, loathing her now as much as before, and yet torn and tortured by doubts; for at his last words she had looked up at him with a sweet, piteous reproach that argued for her some powerful thus words; and he could have sworn that her soft eyes were full of tears.

And now, no doubt, dear girls, you are triumphantly sure of what you suspected long ago. This was the modern Judith, flirting for revenge the false lover who had deserted her sister Betty Blondel, and paid the traitor back with interest. Her success was full-orbed, perfect. She had studied him to the best of her ability, and his shrewd voice, the twitching of the muscles about his mouth, small evidences as they were, spoke volumes to a man so versed in self-controlled as this one. No doubt about her triumph; but there certainly was one drawback to its enjoyment.

When she came to cut off his head—metaphorically speaking, of course—our little Judith had discovered—the—what was Holofernes's Poor little spider! Weaving webs for him, how hopelessly had she tangled herself! Long ago she had been conscious enough to find love delightful it was to punish him, how much more the thought of the pain that the punishment must seem to him of Betty rose between them. Now she went away successful, but in despair. When he came back to her, he must have acknowledged him as its king. When he turned away from her in scorn she could not help applauding him and his spirit, though she was glad to die, and that he was taking away with him all that would make her life worth living; and she despised herself more, morally certain that Eversham would go away that night, as disappointed lovers always do in the romances; and this from henceforth she was to be known as the beautiful Iceberg, or something of that sort, and never smile; and by-and-by should marry some stout man of the neighborhood, who would have shown shed should go heavily veiled, and strew roses on his tomb, etc., etc.

After which she went down stairs and flirted with Jo Shafton shamefully.

But Eversham did not depart, as per romance bound. On the contrary, he stayed on there. Partly because of the doubts that haunted him, partly to show that he did not think her worth a change of plan. Also, he was a man who, as usual, in the eyes of society; but with such hopeless gulf between them. Smile and gesture about him,

WITH wind that rageth o'er the sea,
With biting fang and dreadful cry,
What storm-bent creatures plead to thee,
To spare them lest they sink and die!
With voice of sullen wrath
Thou leapest on thy path,
O'er wreck and found'ring ship,
"Mid cries from seaman's lip!
Cast out like scattered tares,
With wounded sobs and prayers;
Thy home the waters darkly blue
All the bitter winter through.

Soft wind that roameth to the sea,
With tender touch and smiling sound,
A thousand voices sing with thee
Upon thy tuneful, fragrant round.
With gentle sigh of love,
The coo of muted dove,
Where bees still droning sip
The honeyed petals' lip;
Thy breath a fresh perfume
Of flowers' sweetest bloom;
Thy home the heaven's sunlit blue
All the joyous summer through.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

AFTER THE BALL.

THE ball was over. The Marquis of Grandacres had not proposed to Amelia: but he had danced once with her, and that, as she said to her sister, "was something toward it."

Moreover, Thurstan Mowbray had paid no attention whatever to Lady Diana. Amelia, in the confidential hours of dressing-gown and slippers, mentioned this circumstance to her sister with great satisfaction; but Lady Diana herself viewed it in a different light, for on the pages of the volume before mentioned she inscribed:

"Lady Bridesmaid avoids you is lost."

She was annoyed to be not disheartened by Thurstan's apparent coldness. Well versed in all the mutability of suffering of which the human heart is capable, she knew that as the fish in dying displays a variety of hues (strange beauty born of mortal pain) ere it is overspread by the dull color of death, so does a lover exhibit curious and unpardonable developments of feeling before his love perishes in indifference. She had known prouder men than this one assume the most profound innocence of fear and her attractions; she had seen them hold aloof from her, restraining jealously, with all the power of their wills, the impetuous tendernesses of eye, lip, and hand. She had known others, more subtle in their tactics, pretend to a careless ease of manner, the better to conceal the reality of their pain; but sooner or later the attempt to dissimulate with their passion ended in utter failure and the slave crouched more and more beneath the sweet oppression of a bondage more exquisite than freedom.

Lady Diana found compassionate defeat, but she could never resolve to spare where she encountered opposition. She was like the Palestine warrior of old, who "slew plentifully," and then "bewailed courteously" over the heaps of slain.

Besides, she felt something of her old tenderness revive for this handsome man. True, her tenderness was an Eastern potentate's, had a touch of the bow-string in it; but hers was a moral strangulation. She would strike all that was good in a man's heart rather than think it should not beat for her. A husband must leave his wife, a lover his mistress, sooner than defy her influence. Let there had been cases where she had mourned the ruin she had wrought, and had even tried to lure the delinquents she herself had fashioned back into their moral perpendicular.

Fancy a spas-tree speculating for its malign influence, and discovering that its progress should be rejected by the victim!

In her own way Lady Di had loved Thurstan. She loved him more the less for his defiance of her now; but she swore in her heart that ere long he should be at her feet, body and soul—a human popper, which should take the place of the dolls of childhood, and while the tedium of her leisure hours in which she should weep not tears, breathe real breath, and whose heart should beat fast or slow at her bidding, even as the wax effigies had wept real or smile once more as her infant fingers pulled the wire. But even a child has its preference among dolls, and Lady Diana liked this doll of specimen with the brown eyes and curly hair better than others.

"As to Amelia Orme, she must be taken down," said Lady Di to herself, as she watched this young lady's little manœuvres to attract Thurstan's attention.

But coquetry is the elder gamblers, ere victims of chance. Lady Di had calculated on passing a few weeks in the quasi lover's society. She had planned every move in her game with a precision worthy of a professional chess-player. She disliked to be worried in her play. To do her justice, she preferred to retain an aspect of dignity, even of modesty, in these ignoble encounters. A player who attempts to be over-adversary fool's mate, looking very hard in another direction all the while to divert suspicion, Lady Di kept an innocent countenance during the progress of her machinations. I think this appearance of lamb-like unconsciousness was one of the most potent snares wherewith this beauty lured prey to her wolfish maw. But for the present, at least, the game was stopped—the pieces overset.

On the morning succeeding the ball at Orme House Thurstan was sitting in the music-room, turning over a song for one sister, while he decorously perused the large print of another, when the song and the flirtation were brought to a premature close by the entrance of a servant, who brought on a silver a telegraphic message for Captain Mowbray. It announced that his father was very dangerously ill, and it requested his immediate presence at Eton.

It was as if a funeral train flung its gloomy shadow over a path gay with bridal flowers. A cloud fell on the fair face of Di. It is dismal to be recalled from laughter, music, and mirth to the voice of the bell which tolls fnis, and the vision of the inevitable which tolls for all; which fashion endures forever, independent of millineis and mourning warehouses. Besides the natural awe which falls even on the most lighthearted at the sound of that ugly word death, those around Captain Mowbray had their own selfish emotion for mingle with his sorrow. Amelia Orme was becoming really attached to him, and the idea of his departure made her feel sore at heart. Lord Ivor was disturbed because Mr. Mowbray had been a contemporary of his own. "What a sad thing! He was a fine man, you know. Older than me, but still we were school-fellows."

"That doesn't make it any sadder, papa, does it?" muttered Rosa, pertly, not seeing that Lord Orme's regret was as one tree may feel when its coeval falls, by some wind's unwonted force.

Lady Di, sitting in a corner in a becoming attitude (becoming attitudes came as naturally to Lady Di as breaking dolls and nice same small snowy duplicates of herself? Wrong again! I said I would guess no more. I spoke hastily. To contain a delight or delight which thrilled me when her hands clasped mine caressingly—a delight which died almost as soon as it was born, for she looked away from me again and caught hold of a pale cluster of chrysanthemums.

Then, with her face sparkling, and breath coming quick, she cried:

"I have seen some people!"

What description of people?

"I have seen horses and dogs, and men in red coats, and ladies"—two ladies I think. I saw—and the Duke ditional interest in her eyes now that she had seen their living representative. When she next went down stairs she paused to wonder whether this Mowbray inherited any of the daring which made Gaston de Mowbray throw himself before the body of his young brother, a living shield, which presently fell hacked with wounds, while the boy rode away unscathed. Azalea, living in an ideal world, could not suspect how ignoble were the aims, how mean and trifling the ambition of the majority of nineteenth-century heroes, who were gold lace and spurs.

After looking at the portrait which seemed to her to embody the lineaments of the gay rider on horseback who had flashed toward her through the gray woods yesterday, Azalea walked softly into the large salon, and looked at her own reflection in the old-fashioned mirror.

This is what Robert Douglas saw when, a few minutes later, his tall form and moody face darkened the doorway.

The bright glow of her cheeks and hair showed dimly through the dust and cobwebs which obscured the mirror; a crack meeting the dimple in her chin, a tremulous thread, blotched by a spider, seemed to wave down from her hair; her hands were busy securing a rose over one little ear, a fillet of ribbon glistened behind the other. The rose secured, Azalea stepped back, on her toes, with such a look of meditation as a bird wears when it puzzles over its duplicate in a mirror.

She was asking herself for the first time, "Am I fair?"

And Douglas, watching her from the door, felt his heart-core turn with pain as he saw the nascent symptom of coquetry, the first consciousness of physical beauty develop itself in one who had hitherto been as careless of her loveliness as the birds of the air.

"Why are you decking yourself in this way?" he asked, savagely.

"I don't know," she stammered, half frightened, "I never thought; I was only wondering."

"I have sometimes wished for you, child," Azalea, that you were ill-favored as the women who are burned red in autumn suns, and coarsened by labor. But I comforted myself with thinking there was safety even for beauty in solitude, and now—" He checked himself, remembering that to scare a child or a woman at once is to expose them to it. He added more gently—

"Forgive me for speaking so roughly, Azalea; but if you only knew how I should shrink to see your guileless face spoiled by consciousness of its attraction." Be content with the beauty God has given you."

"I meant no harm," the girl faltered, looking down; but when Douglas left her to make his morning prayers she lifted her head with a smile as she spoke. "I am glad his scolding he thinks me fair—he owned as much."

Then she went and sat at the window, and looked wistfully at the avenue path, which seemed to tremble in the light and shadow which played over it, and which proves that Douglas had been wiser had he held his peace.

There are two hells made by man for himself —remorse and jealousy. Which is the most terrible of endurance, the hell of the past or the hell of the present? In which is the flame hottest? Remorse is the dull, low throb of unassuageable pain, jealousy the wild bound of a fever which is almost craze.

What have I done to deserve this last? I feel not overwhelmed—that I have wandered through all the prime of my life with my head down; that for me no bird is jubilant, no sun is bright, no voice is glad?

For years I have carried a pall. What devil possessed me that I should break from my self-made to clutch at roses? That man whose life I saved, need he have cast the shadow of his beauty over the one object of sunshine in my path? "He would come again!" Of course he came. He was seized with an immense interest in the old portraits and books. "Will Miss Mowbray call her all about them?" She begins shy and flushing at the sound of her own voice. She speaks with her ear to me, and looks at him. He has the pure, unconscious regard of an angel. Mean while the young moon yawns a good deal, but takes every available opportunity of lingering nearer to her, of touching her hand, of caressing, when they go home, stray curls blown about her head by the wind.

It is a fortnight since that day when this fresh curse in my life began. Perhaps the happiest pang of all is to feel that were I free, and were my soul clean, so that I could place myself at her feet, and humbly ask to walk away, repenting that I was thus prostrate. I never could be to her even a possibility. I rank with her old guardian, with the grave shadows of the house, with all the familiar scenes of childhood: I am an appendage. This Mowbray is in himself a new event, an event which colors all her hitherto lueless existence.

A fortnight to-day since he crossed my path, and he has been here nearly every day since. Heaven help me! My haste of him is becoming hideous. This mean, bitter jealousy dwarfs the big heart into that of a fretting child. I loathe and scorn myself for the ignoble torture self-inflicted. I pore over crabbed pages, hold my head between my hands, and try not to catch the reflection of that withered, harsh face peering at me from the cracked mirror opposite, and then her presence approaches in that gust of lonely-sounding wind tossing the bough against the pane; her face appears in that star which sparkles in the upper square of the casement. She pervades the whole chamber, and my thoughts fall into confusion again. I am crushed by the misery of my presence.

CHAPTER XXXI.

LOVE PASSED AN HOUR OF LOVE WITH ME.

THE hours "crawled" (that was George Moore's term for the dreamy, drowsy, autumn noons) into days, and days slipped into weeks, and still Captain Mowbray lingered in the vicinity of Avalon, showing an increasing interest in what he vaguely described as "the books and pictures, and all that sort of thing." What need to repeat the details of the old, old story; what need to dwell on all the sudden impulses which point to one inevitable result? The sun and the sunflower, the moon that draws the sea, and the cloud that stoops from heaven to take her in his arms—he had done that often enough to have lost its charm, but something in her innocence and defenselessness rendered even this commonplace conquest what it would have done. He had referred more than once to that by-gone episode; and the girl had begged so softly, had shown such genuine distress at the reminiscence, that he had not the heart to pursue the subject—only he sometimes found in "very hard times" and the offense; and on this especial day he felt himself tempted beyond the power of resistance; hence he had, as he said, "broken out," and had asked Azalea if "she didn't like him, just a little bit?" and he was answered by that silence, more exquisite than words, which belongs to modesty—the proud modesty of seventeen—which made the girl ivory of any outspoken expression of her heart's secret.

Captain Mowbray, better accustomed to women of the world, always equal to every occasion, waxed impatient at her silence.

"Do say you like me, Azalea."

Azalea mechanically mechanically the flecks of light that danced on a laurel-leaf, and was silent.

"Then you don't care for me; and I suppose I had better go away, and never come here any more."

She paled visibly, and stole a glance at his pitiful pathos, half-fearful.

"Why don't you speak, then?" he said, viciously annihilating a tall nettle which grew near his foot.

Still no answer. It was foolish of her, but something in Mowbray's handsome flattered him more than the grace of consummate ease would have done.

"Do you wish me to go?"

"N-n-n-o."

"Oh!"

He was at her feet in an instant; then, in pity to her scared look, he only rested his lips on her little hands.

"My little darling!", he said, passionately, "I love you, and I long to kiss you; but never mind; I won't without leave. I did it once before when you couldn't help yourself, which was shabby of me; so now I'll wait for your permission."

Azalea trembled, and felt that he was heroically self-denying; but he would not consent by releasing her hands, but held them tightly, looking up in her face with an expression which methinks is not apt to fill a man's eyes after the long hunt and the sweet-scented prey. Sad-colored has thought in his gaze, even in the maddest delirium of pleasure; it is only sweet-and-twenty who squanders his delight, believing it to be inexhaustible.

Ere long the sun burned low in the west, and the lovers moved homeward. It was not until they stood in the porch in that farewell pause which indicates so much that Thurstan suggested,

"Couldn't you—couldn't you—say good-night properly, Azalea?"

He lowered the brown mustache to rather closer proximity with her lips. For an instant she hesitated, and that hesitation was in itself a caress; but she pulled her hands free and fled precipitately into the room where Moore crossed over the fire in company with a blinking cat, on whom Topaz kept a wakeful eye of aggression.

Captain Mowbray waited an instant to the chance of Azalea's return. Then he philosophically lit a cigar and walked away.

"Ram cannot overcome ears," he meditated; "they never run straight. Now if I cared about my future prospects I'd spend two or three hours in their company I should like to kiss them."

THE NATIONAL CAMP-MEETING.

We give this week a large number of illustrations relating to the National Camp-Meeting which opened July 6, at Round Lake, New York. The sketches are from photographs, and others from sketches by MR. STANLEY FOX.

The idea of holding annually a National Camp-Meeting of the Methodist Episcopal Church, for a gathering to include representatives of every Conference in the United States, was started about three years ago, and in July, 1867, the first meeting of the kind was held at Vineland, New Jersey. The second meeting was held last summer at Manheim, in Pennsylvania, with equally gratifying results.

The meeting at Round Lake this summer was peculiarly fortunate in its surroundings. A most desirable location could not have been chosen. The ground, which is midway between Troy and Saratoga Springs, consisted of about forty acres. Throughout their whole extent these are shaded by beautiful trees, and are plentifully supplied with streams and springs of water; while to the north lies Round Lake—a sheet of water about one mile in length. These grounds were laid out with rare taste and judgment in avenues and streets, and the different sections were divided into plots for cottages and tents. The grounds are the property of the Round Lake Camp-Meeting Association of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Troy Conference, which was incorporated about two years ago by the State Legislature.

To secure perfect order—a matter of the first importance, where, as in this case, about 20,000 people are gathered together—a detachment of the Metropolitan Police of Troy was present.

The Rev. MR. ISSAKIE, of Baltimore, preached the opening discourse. On Sunday, July 11, an appropriate and impressive sermon was delivered by Bishop Simpson. Sunday, the children's service in the Methodist Episcopal Church. His immediate auditory numbered 8000 persons. Twenty-eight States of the Union were represented at this camp-meeting. There was no disturbance, and all who attended the meeting were comfortably provided for.

THE FIAT OF FATE.

A POET, where water-flags all yellow grow,
A country bank where fragrant willows stand
Like sentinels, to guard the coward flow
Of those clear wavelets in between the land.
To where they reach, a stream-like, and dance move
The miller's chattering, restful-going wheel,
And fill with sweet watery whiteness every grove
With low-voiced cries, as if they, too, could feel.
Lured on by the gay willows, standing watch
Two little boats of bark with paper sails
Which float upon the pool, a minute match
In pledge of Fate, and now at the last bell.
Mab, the arch little one, kneels down, "See, see,
My boat is moving straight, my love is true."
And pointing to the toy, she turns with glee
And does not answer, for eyes are bent in few.
Constance, with features straight, and nut-brown hair,
A hazel-brown, all lighted gaily,
Her boat capsizing in a brush of air,
Cries, "Mab, my love is false—he's false." And so it is.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

DOWN IN THE WOODS—A niter.

REVIVING BROWNING PERSONS.

As the bathing season has commenced, and persons are liable to drowning several times this summer, the following item will tell how to bring them to:

If the drowned person be a politician, whisper in his ear that he has just been appointed to a fat office. If a married woman, softly tell her that her husband is not coming home, but with that woman she hates.

If a young man, tell him confidentially that another fellow is offering sweet-heart.

If a married man, slyly tell him that a handsome young lady called yesterday, and left a kiss for him to pay at his office on important private business.

BASE-BALL.

The secondary sun was pouring down
Upon a meadow new set with grass,
Where stood a youth with bat on high
And on the comrade running by.
"Base-ball!"

He hopes to win himself a name
By playing soon "a great match game."
For him 'twill be the greatest fame
To hear the words, "Five Oaks have won."
"Base-ball!"

His brow was bumped, his eye was black,
His coat was torn from off his back;
But still, like battered Bunker Hill,
The accents of that swollen tongue,
"Base-ball!"

Around the field he saw the light
Of friendly faces beaming bright,
And by the bats all piled in a heap,
And from his lips escapes a groan,
"Base-ball!"

"Now stop the game," the old man said,
"That 'secret service' fund has fled."
The 'pitcher,' too, has sprained his wrist,
The 'umpire's' brain is in a mist."
"Base-ball!"

"Oh, drop that ball!" the maiden said,
"And make a long 'base hit' instead."
A "hot ball" hit him in the eye,
And still he answered with a sigh,
"Base-ball!"

"Beware! you'll soon be out on foul!"
This was the "fielder's" kind counsel rendered,
But still re-echoed in his ear,
In that deep voice, no thick and queer,
"Base-ball!"

"Tied up," he said, sank on the ground,
While plying comrades gathered round,
And in the awful throes of death,
He murmured, with his latest breath,
"Base-ball!"

There on the cold earth, drear and gray,
To perfect jelly smashed, he lay,
While o'er him the umpire's solemn air
Was heard the victor's loud hurra,
"Base-ball!"

* * *

An Englishman, boasting of the superiority of the horses in his country, mentioned that the celebrated Eclipse had been able in a minute to "go over a mile," exclaimed an American present, "that's rather slow! Why, sir, we have a horse that common roadsters, I live at my country seat, near Philadelphia, and when I want to go to town, of a morning, my horse is generally ready for me. I can't keep up with him, but generally comes in the way I can find him from a mile to a minute or a half after my arrival. One morning the beast was restless, and I thought he had set his head to run from around a large factory, just to take the old Harry out of him. Well, sir, I had to run for my life, and every time I saw my back directly before me, and was twice in danger of losing my scalp over myself."

* * *

A shabby-genteel young man entered a tradesman's store the other day with his hands crammed in both pockets, and his coat over them with the ruins. "Mr. J——," said he, "I believe I am indebted to you sixty-two cents. I would have called around somewhere about a year ago." "Yes, Sir," replied the tradesman, with a benevolent hollow in his head to receive the ready cash. "I am glad you have come, for I had almost forgotten it myself." "Well, I shouldn't get these things," said the fellow: "I like to have all things square. As I was going to send an errand-boy, seven and a half cents more, which will make seven money."

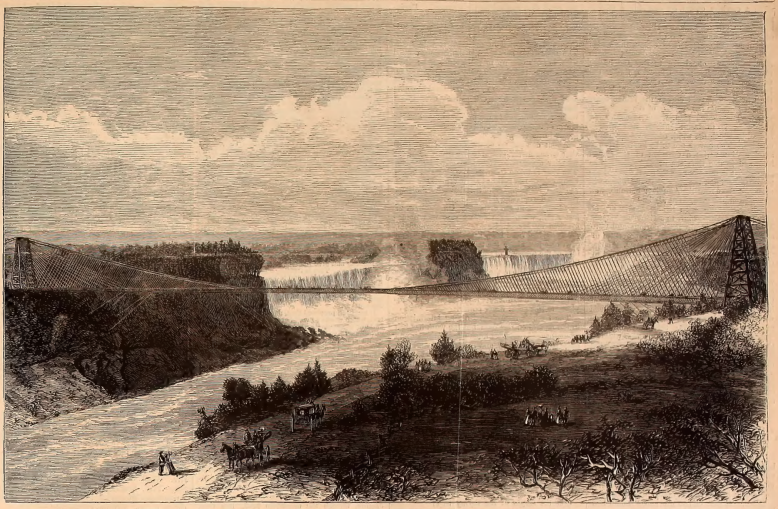
SNUFF-TAKING.

What a moment, what a doubt!
Awful is little out—
All my thrilling, tickling caustic,
Pyramid rhinoceratic
Wants to sneeze, and can not do it!
How it yearns to sneeze within me, ellyou!
How that rapturous torment fills me!
Now says, "Sneeze, you coward, or get through it."
Shee—shee—oh, 'tis most del-ishi!
Shee—shee—most delishi!
Hang it, I shall sneeze till spring!
Snuff's a most delicious thing.

ON THE BEACH AT NEWPORT, RHODE ISLAND.—[DRAWN BY C. G. BUSH.]



NEW SUSPENSION BRIDGE, NIAGARA FALLS—FROM THE CANADA SIDE.

THE NEW SUSPENSION BRIDGE, NIAGARA FALLS.

THE longest suspension bridge in the world is that which connects the village of Niagara Falls with Clifton in Canada. It was first opened to the public about six months ago, and is a beautiful structure, exhibiting remarkable engineering skill. Before the erection of this bridge the only method of crossing the river near the Falls was by a ferry-boat; a passage across the Old Suspension Bridge involving a long ride or walk of about two miles on each side. The new bridge enables one to cross from the American side after only a short walk from the principal hotels, and is located in full view of the Great Cataract, and the grand scenery which surrounds it.

This bridge is 1268 feet long, the cables from which it is suspended being nearly 1900 feet. They are composed of seven wire ropes, each rope consisting of seven strands, and are securely imbedded at the extremities — on the American side in heavy masonry, and on the Canadian side in the solid limestone rock. The American tower is 100 feet high, that on the other side being 105 feet. The suspenders are of wire rope, and twenty-four wire rope stays on each end of the bridge check undulatory motion. The combined strength of the cables and stays is found equal to the support of 3000 tons. The roadway of the bridge is composed of two cords 10 feet apart, upon which are laid the needle-beams 5 feet apart. These cords are strengthened by channel bars of iron running the whole length on the under side, and so attached as to form a continuous plate. The elevation of the bridge above the Niagara River is about 180 feet, varying a little according to the general level of the lakes and the force of the wind. The depth of the water in the channel is 250 feet.

From the United States Collector of Customs, whose office is at the entrance of the bridge on the American side, and who courteously gave us many items of information, we learned that the New Suspension Bridge is well patronized, being found so much more convenient than the old one. In the "season" two or three hundred dollars a day is often taken for toll.

The narrow roadway is a disadvantage which it has been proposed to remedy. At present, when a carriage enters on one side, a wire is pulled, which strikes a bell on the other side, to indicate that no carriage must be admitted in an opposite direction. But if the travel during the present season renders it expedient, the bridge will be widened. Two plans for doing this have been proposed; one being to saw the bridge through longitudinally and insert a timber ten feet long in the division of each needle-beam, bolting the timbers securely, and planking over the whole. This will spread the bridge apart without lessening the strength at the entrance, and the surrounding grounds neatly laid out.

This New Suspension Bridge is now one of the most attractive points to a visitor at Niagara Falls. In itself it is a most curious and wonderful structure; and indeed in the country of derisit structure; and indeed in the country of derisit structure; and indeed in the country of derisit

IMPROVED ALUMINIUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its lustre and resemblance to Gold are such that even judges have been deceived. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only been set forth in the columns of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition.

The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as all these goods are manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to warrant them as equal to any first-class keepers.

Price now $16 to $22.

Further details will be found in my pamphlet, which will be sent, postpaid, on demand.

CIPHER,

THE GREAT GALAXY SERIAL.

BY MRS. JANE G. AUSTIN.

One Vol., Octavo, Elegantly Illustrated. Price, bound in Paper, $1 00; bound in Cloth, $1 50.

This brilliant Serial was recently completed in THE GALAXY. It will be remembered that it was first published anonymously: yet few American novels published without the prestige of a great name have attracted so much attention as CIPHER. It is written in a brilliant and dashing style, and is full of incident. After reading the first page the interest never flags until the end of the story is reached.

Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of the price.

PECULIAR ADAPTABILITY.

Brandreth's Pills.

Their peculiar adaptability to all constitutions as cleansers of the bowels and the blood has established their great merit. They restore the liver, the spleen, and even the heart to healthy action when other remedies have been used without producing any benefit. They do not expose those who use them to any danger, being as safe as salutary.

Extract from Letter to Dr. Brandreth, from C. J. Fay, Esq., F. M., Hoonsnadoc, N.J.

"In 1838 I was in poor health, and my friends as well as myself supposed that my earthly voyage would soon terminate. But after taking one box of Brandreth's Pills, I began to feel better. Well, sir, when I had used up twelve boxes I was a well, healthy man —my weight having gone from 121 pounds up to 152 pounds. I then stopped, and between that time and the present I have retailed three thousand dollars' worth of these invaluable pills, and am quite sure that I have thereby been instrumental in saving thousands of lives.

"FRESH AS A MAIDEN'S BLUSH" is the pure beachy complexion which follows the use of HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM. It is the true secret of beauty. Fashionable ladies in society understand this.

The Magnolia Balm changes the rustic country girl into a city belle more rapidly than any other one thing.

Redness, Sunburn, Tan, Freckles, Blotches, and all effects of the summer sun disappear when it is used, and a genial, cultivated, fresh expression is obtained, which rivals the bloom of youth. Beauty is possible to all who will invest 75 cents at any respectable store and insist on getting the Magnolia Balm.

Use nothing but LYON'S KATHAIRON to dress the hair.

THE LATE JOHN A. ROEBLING.

JOHN A. ROEBLING.

JOHN A. ROEBLING, known as the bridge-builder, and regarded as the most talented engineer of the age in that department of his profession, died at Brooklyn on the morning of July 22. His death indirectly resulted from an injury which he had received three weeks previous at the Fulton Ferry slip, when his foot was crushed between the cross-beam of the dock and a float which was entering the slip.

JOHN A. ROEBLING was born on the 12th of June, 1806, in the city of Muhlhausen, in Thuringia, Prussia. His academical studies were pursued in his native city, and on their completion he was sent to the Royal Polytechnic School at Berlin, where he received the degree of Civil Engineer after an unusually brilliant scholastic career. During the next three years he was engaged in superintending Government works in Westphalia.

At the age of twenty-five he came to this country, and settling in the neighborhood of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, devoted himself to agricultural pursuits. The country at that time had just entered upon the grand progressive career which has since brought forth such mighty results. In nearly all of the States canal and slack-water improvements were projected or in progress, so that when Mr. ROEBLING, wearied with the monotony of a farmer's life, sought to enter upon the profession for which he had prepared himself, he experienced no difficulty in obtaining an engagement. For some years he was employed in canal-work; but in the mean while the age had advanced another step, and the old-time canal was forced to give way to the new idea, the railroad. The State of Pennsylvania at this time projected several great railway enterprises, and to the service of that State she assigned, at this sketch spent three years, surveying and locating three lines across the Alleghany Mountains, from Harrisburg to Pittsburg. Of these the middle one was ultimately constructed: is now known as the Pennsylvania Railway, and was built by the company bearing that title, and not by the State. Having completed his surveys MR. ROEBLING commenced the construction of wire rope, producing the first of that fabric that was ever made in the country. The introduction of these ropes on the inclined planes of the old Portage Railroad, over which the canal-boats of the Pennsylvania Canal were transported, was attended with much difficulty and met with much opposition. In 1844 he commenced a suspension aqueduct over the Alleghany River at Pittsburg. This was completed early in 1845, and was the first success that MR. ROEBLING was engaged to construct the Monongahela Suspension Bridge, connecting Pittsburg with Sligo. In 1851 MR. ROEBLING commenced a series of suspension aqueducts on the line of the Delaware and Hudson Canal, connecting the anthracite coal-fields of Pennsylvania with the tide-water of the Hudson River. They were completed within two years, and are all permanent works, needing merely an occasional renewal of the wooden ducts, which in no way affect the stone structure. It was soon after the completion of these works that MR. ROEBLING removed his residence to Trenton, New Jersey.

In 1851 MR. ROEBLING undertook to build a suspension bridge across the Niagara, to connect the Central Railroad of New York and Canada with Western Railway of Canada, and in four years succeeded in constructing the first suspension bridge capable of bearing the immense amount of railroad locomotives and trains. The span of this bridge is 825 feet clear, and its supports are four 10-inch cables. MR. ROEBLING, while the Niagara Bridge was building, was also engaged on another of even greater magnitude. This was to have spanned the Kentucky River on the line of the Cincinnati and Chattanooga Railroad, with a space of 1224 feet; but before the structure had been completed the Company suspended payment, and the work was discontinued. In the fall of 1866 he commenced the great Cincinnati Bridge, whose span is 1030 feet, and after having been forced to suspend operations for several years on account of financial drawbacks, brought it to a successful completion in 1867. In the interim, from 1858 to 1860 inclusive, he was engaged on another suspension bridge at Pittsburg. The last and greatest work of MR. ROEBLING was that on which he was engaged up to the time of his death—the East River Bridge. He had before his death prepared all the plans and made most of the arrangements for the construction of the bridge. MR. ROEBLING won the love and respect of all who knew him, and in his works has left behind him a nobler monument than could be shaped in marble.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 7, 1869.

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

THE recent result in Virginia shows plainly enough the dilemma of the old Democratic party, which is pressed by its action in the Northern States. It has hitherto held tenaciously not only to what it calls the inferiority of the negro, but to its refusal to allow him political equality upon this very point on which the party is now divided. In Virginia the Democratic vote is cast solid for negro suffrage. In California and Oregon negro suffrage is denounced. In Massachusetts Judge J. G. ABBOTT, one of the chief Democratic leaders, writes to Tammany Hall that reconstruction and negro suffrage have been finally settled, however wrongly, and Tammany Hall responds by glorifying the principle of the rebellion. The New York World regards the question in what is evidently accomplished, and hopes for the nomination of General HANCOCK in Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania replies by denouncing the Fifteenth Amendment, which Virginia accepts, and by nominating a typical Copperhead for Governor. The Ohio Democracy virtually declares for repudiation, in the form of the strict letter of the contract. The party agrees only in vague denunciations of "despotism" and "centralization" and "tyranny" and "unscrupulous majorities," which, as it knows, mean nothing, and furnish no issues for an election.

This condition of affairs merely illustrates the old truth that the Democratic Democratic party was an instrument used wholly by Southern leaders for Southern purposes. During the last ten years it has had but one moment of apparent revival, and that was at the opening of the last Presidential campaign. The reason was, that the Southern leaders returned for that occasion from rebellion to the control of the party. The result was its defeat, despite its desperate frauds in New York, Pennsylvania, and Indiana. But now that the Southern leaders have again withdrawn, the party drifts and drivels among its old dogmas, wholly unable to confront the situation and to adapt itself to the utterly changed aspect of affairs. It is paying the penalty of its old subservience to Southern mastery. That mastery forbade independence and rewarded the most abject servility. It humiliated DIX and DOUGLAS, and promoted PIERCE and BUCHANAN.

As a national party, professing certain great principles and advocating a distinct policy, the Democratic party does not exist; but as an organization for place and plunder it is still powerful. It is the party of the old disappointed and dissatisfied. It relies upon ignorance and passion, and watches eagerly for the mistakes of the party in power. While its Northern wing plants itself squarely in the Southern accepting equal rights, the Southern wing proclaims them and sneers at its Northern allies. Such is the lucrative and pitiful dilemma of those allies that there can be no doubt, if the Northern conventions had been held after the result in Virginia had been fully considered, they would all have followed the lead of its indications, and have done what Judge ABBOTT advised Tammany Hall to do. With what profound contempt a man like WADE HAMPTON must watch the flabby political feebleness of his old lackeys!

Meanwhile an organized party intent upon obtaining power at all hazards is to be carefully watched also by those who know well its aims and hopes to gratify its desires. By the stupid system of electing a President, to which we still unfortunately cling, the fortunes of parties in elections is especially exposed to fraud. The real Presidential campaign is now always confined to three or four States whose vote is decisive. Last year they were Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Indiana. The electoral vote in these States might have been easily changed by unscrupulous popular majorities elsewhere. Thus the election of the President is not necessarily the expression of the popular will.

The Democratic managers would hardly expect, under any circumstances, to poll an actual majority of the votes cast at the next national election; but they hope, as we have before mentioned, how they will not scruple to attempt to carry the electoral vote. MR. CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS, JUN., in his striking paper before the Social Science Association at Albany, last winter, shows that ten thousand majority for the SEYMOUR electoral ticket in New York last autumn, and frauds elsewhere upon the result as one hundred and sixty thousand majority for the GRANT electoral ticket in Illinois, Massachusetts, and Vermont. It is notorious that that majority will be found in the ballot-boxes and known. The chief method was a system of dishonest naturalization, of which Tammany Hall has been the centre. But the Democratic party every where opposes any scheme for purifying the ballot-box; and its reliance for the next general election is a concentration and development of the same frauds of the method that carried New York last year.

Do we therefore claim that all honest men belong to the Republican party? By no means. But we do most heartily repudiate the assertion that one party is as bad as another. If this were true there would be no Union to-day. The Republican party has always had honorable members, and undoubtedly makes mistakes. But it is always that party which strives to protect the purity of the polls, and which relies upon the intelligence and conscience of the country. The great frauds which have been practiced or attempted upon the expression of the honest will of the people have been directed to the Republican party; they are identified with their opponents.

As a party of principles, then, we repeat, the Democratic party has ceased to be formidable; but as a conspiracy against honest elections it still challenges the vigilance of every man who values true popular government. It is to be remembered that all who justify the rebellion and pledge the "lost cause"—all who would repudiate the national debt and dishonor the national name—all who disbelieve in popular government—all who would perpetuate hostilities of race—all who oppose a registry and its strict enforcement—the ignorant and the dangerous part of the population—instinctively ally themselves to the party that is responsible for the vast system of political frauds. Is this the party to which the people of Maine, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Iowa wish to confide the welfare of their States?

OUR NEUTRAL DUTIES.

IN the month of May, 1793, a French privateer, fitted out in Charleston, South Carolina, brought a British prize into the port of Philadelphia. President WASHINGTON, on the advice of HAMILTON, directed the arrest of the officers in charge, HENFIELD and SINGLETARY. The sale of the prize was stopped, and it was held by the Government until the lawful owner could prove his title. HENFIELD, says MR. GEORGE BEMIS, in his admirable and instructive pamphlet upon American Neutrality, "was energetically and thoroughly prosecuted;" and the President commended the subject to Congress in his next annual address, and his recommendation resulted in the passage of the law of 1794. When HENFIELD and SINGLETARY were arrested, GENET, the Minister of the French Republic, wrote to MR. JEFFERSON, then Secretary of State, an offensive letter, demanding their immediate release. GENET said:

"The crime laid to their charge—the crime which my mind can not conceive, and which my pen almost refuses to state—is the saving of France, and defending, with her children, the common and glorious cause of liberty."

To this letter MR. JEFFERSON replied with coolness and dignity, saying, in speaking of HENFIELD:

"The act with which he is charged will be examined by a jury of his countrymen in the presence of judges of learning and integrity, and if it is not contrary to the laws of the land he doubtless need be entertained that his case will issue accordingly."

The kind of amusement manifested by GENET is repeated. We have been also expressed by General GOICOURIA when he was lately arrested for a similar offense; while the Administration, for enforcing the Neutrality laws, is denounced in some quarters as not less detestable than the authorities that enforced the old Fugitive Slave law. In what respect are the Neutrality laws like the Fugitive Slave law? The latter tried to make every American citizen an accomplice in the perpetuity of American slavery. The former say to foreigners like the Cuban or the Greek, "Settle your own quarrels; you must fight your own battles, and free your own slaves, as we have ours." Is that to connive at the existence or the fetters of slavery? The argument in the denunciation of the Administration is, that the Cubans have proclaimed the liberty of the slaves, and not to help them is to help their oppressors. But, if it means any thing, means that this nation ought to abolish its Neutrality laws, and take a hand in every fight in which the popular sympathies may be enlisted. It means that we must assist any number of persons, for any purpose whatever, should be allowed to embroil this country in any foreign quarrel. And it is to prevent every thing that the Neutrality laws are passed. They provide that the peace of the world shall not be at the mercy of a few men, whether honest or dishonest, more intriguing for action or striking for liberty. "The rule which prohibits the using of neutral territory," says CALHOUN, "is founded on the escape of the Alabama," as a position from which to attack an enemy, is simply indispensable to the existence of neutrality. Without it a war between any two states would rapidly draw into its vortex the whole world."

It is plain that if some foreigners or natives may be allowed to make hostile expeditions in this country to abolish slavery in other countries, then other foreigners and natives must be allowed to do the same to establish slavery in other countries. And it must either any thing the former alone shall be allowed, or the latter, or neither. But if we say the former, who shall decide? Evidently those who are interested. In which case any Colonel RYAN or General GOICOURIA may plunge nations into war and incalculable suffering under pretense of extending liberty. This is merely unreasonable folly. It is for the people of this country, not for any RYAN or GOICOURIA, to determine when it shall take the risk of war.

Besides, if it be the duty of this country to help a foreign revolution against an oppressive government, it is no less its duty to organize revolution against oppressive governments. If a people too weak to overthrow a despotism rightfully demands our assistance, how much more a people too weak even to begin to overthrow it? Indeed, there is no end of the absurdities into which such a position conducts us. It is, in fact, the principle of the Holy Alliance. It destroys all international comity and relegates the world to barbarism.

When the Cuban revolution began there was but one duty for this Government. It could recognize the independence of Cuba, if it could remain neutral. There was no third course. It certainly could not pretend to do one and refuse to do the other. If it was of opinion that we ought to interfere for Cuba and help the revolution, then its honorable course was plain. If it thought otherwise, its honorable course was plain also. Above all things, the Government was not to lie and sneak. It was to execute the laws in good faith, or to adopt the principle that they were open to lie. Now ought it to have recognized the independence of Cuba? The revolution began last October. The Cubans have won no decisive battle; they hold no port; they have no recognized civil authority known to us; the struggle has been a guerrilla warfare of which we have only vague rumors. We all know, indeed, that the Cuban government of Spain will be brutal; but we did not think it our duty to overthrow it. Now that the Spaniards themselves have overthrown it at home, is it our duty to interfere in Cuba upon the plea that the old government was oppressive? And must we then proceed to inquire into the character of other governments to determine whether they shall be allowed to continue?

We do not believe that the people of this country wish to imitate the French Republic of the old Revolution, and undertake the active propagandism of liberal government. They see with pleasure and sympathy and admiration the efforts of other people to do what they have themselves done; but they know that human liberty and progress and welfare are most surely secured by the traditional policy of the country, that of honest neutrality, which reserves the discretion of open and efficient assistance at the proper time. And if the sympathy of this country for the Cubans has seemed to be lacking, it is due to the mistaken zeal of those Cuban advocates who insist that it is a heinous crime not to renounce that policy, and who bitterly denounce as blood-hounds a patriot officer of the United States who faithfully execute the laws maintaining that policy—laws which, unlike the old fugitive law, are not in themselves wrong, but whose purpose is most civilized and humane.

DE FACTO GOVERNMENTS.

THE Sun, which is the devoted friend of the Cuban revolution, recently suggested that the Administration should decide to recognize the Government in Spain, and acknowledge that in Cuba. But upon what grounds should we refuse to recognize the Spanish Government? Last October the people of Spain, by a virtually bloodless revolution, changed their government. They have framed a most liberal Constitution, and the new system is not forcibly opposed. The new Government exercises, by common consent, all its functions. It administers justice; it collects taxes; it maintains public order. All the great interests of the nation are undisturbed; and although it can not be expected that a country with the antecedents of Spain will escape political troubles, it has made an extraordinary step of progress in an extraordinary manner. In February, 1848, when the French Republic was declared in Paris, MR. RUSH, our Minister, instantly acknowledged it as the existing government. There was no just complaint of his action. But if it were proper, why the recognition of the actual Spanish Government be improper?

Such a recognition is not an approval. We send a Minister to Turkey; but do we therefore approve the principle or the practices of the Turkish Government? Not at all. We recognize the people the right to settle their claim for ourselves, of changing their government at their pleasure. But in Cuba the situation is wholly different, as we have elsewhere intimated. Instead of a sudden and successful change of government there is a contest which has continued for nine or ten months, and no friend of the Cuban cause will seriously assert that there is any active authority visible beyond the range of the republican guerrillas that can honestly be recognized as a government. The Sun says that "it is time that this republic was something more than a dummy in the family of nations." But is the way to become so, to recognize a "dummy" republic? For whatever we may think and hope of the issue of the Cuban war, no honest Cuban will deny that no conceivable republic could be more "dummy" than in the Cuban.

The principle for which the Sun contends is, that we shall recognize the governments that we like, and refuse those that we do not like. Now it certainly can not be said that we—the Americans—like the governments of England or of France, nor of Austria or Russia. We like republican and popular governments. Shall we therefore call home our Ministers in those countries? When the Spanish revolution occurred Mr. HALE acknowledged the new order. That was simply saying that the United States recognized the right of Spain to change its government. The Sun says, however, that the revolution "was welcomed by the United States in the hope that it would produce great good. But the hope is now bitterly disappointed, and we are free to act accordingly." But does the Sun seriously suppose that MR. HALE acknowledged the change because the people of the United States expected that Spain would become a republic, and that, if they had not expected that result, MR. HALE would not have been sustained in his action?

Of course, also, we must concede what we claim. If we decline to recognize the Spanish Government because it is not republican, other nations may refuse to acknowledge ours because it is republican. We may, indeed, reiterate that we don't care whether they do or not. But is this a reasonable strain? Is it of no importance to liberty and civilization whether nations undertake to manage each other's internal affairs? Indeed, does any thing mark the advance of civilization and freedom more decisively than the increased respect for non-intervention? In 1823, as the Sun will remember, the monarchical reaction in France was "bitterly disappointed" by the Constitutional Government which had been established in Spain, and "was free to act accordingly." Consequently France invaded Spain to restore FERDINAND VII. to absolute power. It acted faithfully upon the Sun's present principle. It dealt with the friends of the Constitutional Government as "pretenders and intruders into a society where they did not properly belong." This was one of the greatest conceivable offenses against freedom and international peace. It was the highest mark of the terrible tide of reaction that followed the Napoleonic wars; and out of it sprang our assertion of the inviolability of this continent, known as the Monroe doctrine.

For ourselves, we protest against imitating so wretched an example. We deny our right to meddle, directly or indirectly, in the affairs of other nations, as we demand that they shall respect our independence. It is advocating anarchy to assert that we may decline to regard Napoleon's government as the rightful government of Spain. If that is not, what is the Sun may claim that it only wishes "strenuously to leave it alone." But the situation makes such a course impossible. If the United States Government should refuse to maintain relations with Spain because it has not established a republic, it would add fuel and its own cause a more disastrous blow than any avowed enemy to liberty could inflict.

THE USURY QUESTION.

THE enforcement of the laws of this State punishing this offense, which may be done with fine or imprisonment, or both, has given rise to discussion as to the policy of these laws. Many s in favor of repealing them altogether, so as to leave the rate of interest to be regulated by ty only in the contingency of the failure of rrower and lender to specify the rate, and that case making it six or seven per cent; le others seek only to modify the statutes o the State, so that the offense shall not be nished as a misdemeanor, or indeed at all, t shall expose parties who agree to take over seven per cent. to the loss of the whole interest, or of only the excess of interest above the legal rate.

If it shall be deemed good policy to inflict any penalty upon an usurious lender, it would seem to be necessary to go so far at least as to make it the interest of the borrower to interpose a defense, if the latter were prosecuted by the want of sufficient advantage from making the plea of usury, the statute would remain a dead letter. It is generally considered an act of meanness to plead usury, except in cases where the youth or extreme want of the parties, and the severity of the rate of interest, give to the transaction the character of barbarship. The persons recently proceeded against by indictment and prosecution are not regarded in the light of criminals, but rather as the victims of persecution. These facts must be taken into view in whatever new legislation may be provided, as jurors have a decided prejudice against those who take advantage of the plea of usury, as they will doubtless have against those who indulge in prosecutions because the turn of the wheel put in stock or other speculations is against them.

But our object is not so much to present any view of what has been done in the indictments now pending, or to suggest any modification of State laws, as to call attention to the policy in this matter which ought to follow the abortion by the general government of every full control over the business of banking in the United States. There is now but one issuer of paper-money besides the National banks, and but one regulator of coined money; and it would seem that the usury laws should proceed from the same authority, and be in harmony with the general interest.

From the origin of the government the several States have exercised jurisdiction over the regulation of interest, as they had until during the war over the business of banking. The two subjects belonged together. The money issued by State banks became in practice the money of commerce, for the privilege of issuing it was granted in days when restraints and a certain incorporated persons from doing so. There was good reason for allowing the States to regulate the rate of interest, and the agreements for refusing to conform to them, as long as they remained the depositaries of the banking power.

But with likely to have effect for centuries grew out of this State bank policy, and there was no escape after war had commenced from the necessity of withdrawing, as had been done in effect, this power from the States. The issues of State banks in the shape of paper-money, practically legalized, had the effect from year after year for many years, to make it for the United States nearly an equivalent amount of gold and silver to the paper thus issued; and when war came, finding it impossible to provide for the greatest expenditure made by any nation in ancient or modern times with the trifling amount of gold and silver left in the country, the policy of issuing paper-money by the general government and making it a legal tender was forced on the United States.

The general government, indeed, went further than this, and adopted the National Banking act, alleging the want of the precious metals in the country as the justification for the absorption of this great power. The creation of banks under that act was claimed to be a means of giving currency to the bonds, and to the greenback and National banks issues; and, further, that the exercise of a like power by the States was inconsistent with the success of the new scheme.

The error of permitting State banks to be created, invested with power to issue money, may be referred to as the reason for the paper policy which, on the occurrence of a great war, was forced on the nation. The relations of debtor and creditor were never so seriously interfered with, nor were those between producer and consumer, employers and employés; but the necessities of war compel the adoption of every recognized means for success, and the issuing of paper made a tender was one of too much importance to be overlooked.

The general government, when driven to exercise nearly the same control over the issue of paper-money which it had exercised over the coinage of money, finds itself, after peace, with this business on its hands, with no prospect of immediate change; and the question arises whether control of the usury laws must not follow the exercise of these important powers. The usury laws appertain especially to money, the regulation of the value of which is specially devolved upon Congress; and they appertain also to commerce, power over the regulation of which is also conferred among the enumerated powers.

Massachusetts and other States have repealed their usury laws, except to provide for the single case of an omission between lenders to prescribe the rate of interest; and in those States the rate of interest is six per cent., in others seven, and in some not exceeding ten; and where a specific rate is mentioned or may not be exceeded, the legislation is upheld in the courts for their enforcement, and to punish violations of them, has been followed. This contrariety is inconvenient, and the only remedy appears in the present policy of the National government, but with the prosecution of trade between those in different and distant States.

This difference in the regulations of States on this subject has a tendency to keep us apart while whatever in the shape of fusion the war has legitimately produced is at once followed out to its logical consequences. The policy of having but one issuer of legalized paper-money will be maintained as long as paper is issued by virtue of the right of money to coin. Without that, as the States have nothing to do with the fabrication of coins, or any longer with the creation of paper-money, they cannot be allowed to pass laws which affect materially the value and power of money within their respective limits, especially when the tendency appears to be to establish two standards.

Experience of the repeal of usury laws in Massachusetts will be valuable to the whole country, and will in time afford the true path of future legislation. When the subject comes up in the arena of Congress it will be discussed and decided upon broad principles. If the fabrication of all money coined or that is that of the mining and coinage of the precious metals, we should perhaps feel no difficulty in supporting the policy which Massachusetts has adopted; but since the bulk of the community is restrained from such issues as the National banks make, it would appear to be necessary to guard against the abuses of those who are endowed with this important franchise, and who might use it for oppression. But whatever may be wise in that respect, it is clear that inconsistent and various State regulations should no longer be tolerated on a subject which reaches into the domain of general commerce, and directly affects the business of banking and our whole trade and industry.

THE MAST HOPE MASSACRE.

THE horrible accident at Mast Hope upon the Erie Railway will perhaps have been obliterated from the public mind by some fresher tragedy before this paper is issued. But, as with most of the other events of the kind which are a disgrace to civilization and to this country, little care has been bestowed on it. The Erie road has again become a name of fatal augury; and those are sincerely to be pitied who, living upon its line, are compelled to travel by it. The section on which this accident occurred is one of the most exposed upon that road, or upon any road, and as the care of the most perilous place is a test of the general care, and as two or three shocking accidents have occurred upon it, it is fair to conclude that there is criminal carelessness in the general superintendence of the road. Indeed, it appears upon the most dangerous part of a road, conscious that the knowledge of the exposure will reconcile vigilance, the most inexperienced train hand travel by the Erie should henceforth understand that it is by sheer luck only that he is not crushed or burned before his journey's end.

An article in the Scientific American, a high order of knowledge and experience, states some of the safeguards which are wanting upon most of our railroads, yet which are perfectly practical. A system of signals to correct the misplacing of switches; the safety-brake; the closer connection of the cars, by which a train becomes "an articulated whole;" the proper adjustment of narrow and broad gauge frogs; duo care and sense in the quality of the rails and in the method of laying them; the constant removal of broken and unfit chairs, sleepers, spikes, rails, etc.; a thoughtful consideration of the wear of bridges, and their relative strength to the weight imposed upon them; and the iron car in place of the wooden, engaine of angry splinters and funeral pyre in which we now travel—all these precautions are generally wanting or disregarded in the management of our railroads.

There is something astounding in the patient submission of the public to these slaughters. The accidents of every day upon every road, the delays, the perilous "making up" of lost time, the narrow escapes, nobody takes the trouble publicly to note. Then comes the crash—a train piled up and passengers mangled and roasted alive, tremendous headings in the papers, indignant editorials and demands for justice, an excited coroner's jury with a verdict of criminal negligence and almost murder, a vague expectation of justice upon the part of some of the younger public, and then nothing more until the next burning. In the present case there were at least two emigrant burned to death, besides the Rev. Mr. HALLECK, and the Commissioners of Emigration have made an inquiry. And as has a most vital faith in American railroad management or in American respect for human life and safety in travel who supposes that any body will be punished, or any change in the management of the road be made, in consequence of the awful massacre at Mast Hope.

"IRISH" REPUBLICANS.

A DELEGATE to the Irish Republican Convention which assembles in Cincinnati in regard to our observations upon the term "Irish" as applied to American citizens. He says that he and his friends "do not intend it in any part or sectional sense, but simply with the hope that it may have more weight and influence with their fellow-citizens of similar extraction, and those who are about to become citizens of our country.....I emphatically assert that the men who composed that Convention went in no other capacity than as true, loyal American citizens, and no other purpose than to deliberate how best to perpetuate the true principles of this great American Republic. Heretofore the Convention, as soon as he landed on this shore, went blindly and confidingly into the ranks of the Democratic party, believing it was the national party, the party who upheld his race, and extended to him the hand of brotherhood to the oppressed of all nations."

Our correspondent adds that, to open the eyes of the adopted American citizens, the Convention "met and resolved to form a nucleus round which the newly-arrived emigrant may rally, and from which he may learn his future political position." We cannot become a good, true, freedom-loving American citizen. This was the object of said Convention; and if such be a crime, we plead guilty to the charge."

It certainly is not a crime, nor have we so charged. It is merely a mistake. But it is a very serious mistake; for it tends to perpetuate that kind of feeling among the citizens which it is most desirable to avoid. It is a clumsy and unwise expedient. Moreover, it is wholly unnecessary. An intelligent man, of whatever country, needs no such guide-post; and those for whom it may be thought necessary will be drawn in the other direction by more powerful influences. The Democratic party systematically panders to prejudice and ignorance, and that is a strain in which it must always surpass in its opponents. The principle of the Republican party is plain enough for any body who can comprehend any thing. It is simply fair play for all men. But this, although a very simple and very noble principle, is by no means acceptable to ignoble and ignorant minds. If our friend the Delegate, with his friends, will devote themselves to the plain argument with the new voters, they will serve the cause and the country infinitely more than by appealing to a nationality which they have renounced.

NOTES.

THE Government has made ample and admirable arrangements for observing the total eclipse of the sun on the 7th of August. Professor HALL, of the Naval Observatory, and Mr. JOSEPH A. ROGERS, of the Hydrographic Office, left Washington in May for Bering Straits, under orders from the Navy Department, to take observations in that quarter, and from those unique makes its advents. Professors SIMON NEWCOMB, WILLIAM HARKNESS, and J. R. EASTMAN, of the Naval Observatory, have ordered to Iowa, each to take observations, acting independent of one another. Professor NEWCOMB will take with him the largest object-glass from the Naval Observatory he can procure, and search for asteroids between Mercury and the sun. Some ten years since Professor HARKNESS, of Lawrence, a distinguished astronomer, had a corps of planets existed between Mercury and the sun; they have never as yet been discovered, and no longer are so entertained of their discovery (if they exist), except during a total eclipse. In view of this fact, Professor NEWCOMB will have this particular charge under his direction as part of his duties on this occasion. Professor HARKNESS will make observations with the spectroscope, etc. Dr. CURTIS, of the United States army, will accompany the observers, taking with him the large equatorial telescope of the United States Naval Academy, loaned to the Observatory by Vice-Admiral FARRAGUT for photographic observations. Professor EASTMAN will have charge of and make meteorological observations. All these will go under the auspices of the United States Naval Observatory. Commodore B. F. SANDS, Superintendent, and that institution will have all its professors in the field along the path of totality. At the last total eclipse visible in this country, in 1834, the Government had no facilities for accurate observations.

We have just received the Fifteenth Annual Report (for 1868) of the Superintendent of Public Instruction in this State. This document contains a vast amount of instructive and suggestive statistics. The abolishment of rate-bills, and the substitution of taxation exclusively on property for the school assessment (which, in part, was a tax on attendance), have been productive of good results. School terms have been lengthened, and there has been a larger and more uniform attendance. The expenditures also for school buildings and appliances have been more liberal. The increase in the number of children of school age, as compared with 1867, was 87,687. The increase in the number of those attending school was 21,639. The greater proportion of the increase was in the rural districts. The increase in the number of teachers was 988. The increased amount paid for teachers was $71,035. The report indicates great progress in the several normal schools in the State.

IT is understood that the managers of the French exhibition have agreed to sequence in any conditions that Congress may prescribe upon the part of this country, and that, consequently, the Government will not prevent the landing at Duxbury. We hope then it will be remembered that this Company enjoys an absolute monopoly for twenty years, and that it is a great deal better that this cable should not be laid at all upon our coast than that we should sequence in the monopoly. The Evening Post says that the objection to the landing of the cable is foolish, because it will certainly be laid upon the shore of Canada if we forbid it here. That is very possible; but that does not implicate us, nor tie up the hands of American enterprise for the next twenty years. The Post, as the defender of a chartered monopoly, appears in a new rôle. For the sake of its consistency we hope that it may plead in vain, and that the assent of Congress to the complicity of the French enterprise will be withheld until the monopoly is renounced.

A CORRESPONDENT of a Democratic paper says, pleasantly, that "the government has put the Black Republican boot-lick, and which they so assidously ape, has been guilty of another atrocity." He supposed, of course, that this must be the present government of Dahomey, or the former rule of the Emperor THEODORE, but it turns out to be only that of Russia. The Czar has emancipated the serfs, and has just now abolished the hereditary character of the Russian priesthood, without injustice to any body. These are probably the other atrocities to which the gentle Democrat alludes. The emancipating Czar can hardly expect to be kindly remembered by an individual whose cardinal doctrine in political economy is that some men ought to be physically and politically "walloped" by others.

WE are glad to hear that Messrs. LEE & SHEPARD, of Boston, are about to issue the complete works of SENATOR SUMNER in ten elegant volumes. This edition has been revised by Mr. SUMNER himself, and will be a valuable contribution to our forensic literature. The first volume will contain an excellent likeness of Mr. SUMNER, from a recent photograph taken by J. W. BLACK, of Boston.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE French cable has been landed at Duxbury, Massachusetts. The Company, however, finds itself to conform to the conditions which may be imposed by Congress.

The Newark and New York Railroad was opened on the 31st of July. This is a shorter route between the two cities. It has required an outlay of $2,000,000. It has twenty-seven bridges.

The anniversary of the birth of Humboldt, on the 14th of September, is to be celebrated in St. Louis by a festival, with banners and oration in different languages.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE Pope's Œcumenical Council, it seems, will be attended by none but the strictly orthodox Roman Catholics. Seats are reserved for fifty bishops. Of these 500 are of the Latin nations; viz., 204 Italians, 68 Spanish, 38 French, 29 Portuguese. The Austrian mission is cleared 17 from Brazil, Mexico, and the Republics of South America. There are remaining 36 Germans, 23 English and Irish, 23 North American, 6 Belgian, 5 Dutch, 3 Danish, and 38 Greek and Oriental. To these must be added 70 Cardinals, of whom 40 are Italians.

Great excitement has been occasioned in Spain by the invasion of the Carlists. The news that he had crossed the border was confirmed July 23, and was followed by that of the desertion of numerous adherents. Advices of July 25 report a battle as having taken place at Oteiza, July 16, between Don Modesto, in which the Carlists were defeated.

The insurrection in the Antilles, of Cuba, in view of the prompt action of the United States in arresting the filibusters, has assumed a character adverse to it of his proclamation of the 7th instant, relative to the rights of Spanish citizens to search neutral vessels in the waters near Cuba.

The Harvard Crew, who are to row the international match with the Oxford men on the Thames, arrived in London July 30.

The Irish Church bill, as returned from the British House of Commons, came up again in the House of Lords July 30. The subject of amendments was arranged for consideration.

A terrible colliery explosion took place at St. Helen's, on a few miles north of Liverpool, England, on July 31. Fifty-eight bodies have been taken out of the mine.

THE SEVENTH AT SARATOGA.

THE famous Seventh Regiment of New York has not been forgotten. Its recent pleasure-trip to Troy, Albany, and Saratoga has excited much interest. The appearance of the regiment at Saratoga was the most interesting event of the season at that fashionable resort. We invite our readers' attention to the engraving relating to this subject on this page. We give also on the same page a representation of the statue of a soldier of the Seventh Regiment, made by J. Q. A. WARD, the well-known sculptor. This statue is to be placed in the New York Central Park.

THE KANSAS CITY BRIDGE.

KANSAS CITY, Missouri, although not so well known in the East as Leavenworth, Omaha, St. Joseph, and possibly some other Missouri River towns, enjoys remarkable advantages of natural location and commercial facilities. It is already the terminus of seven different railroads. To Kansas City belongs the honor of building the pioneer bridge over the Missouri. On the south or west side of the river the Pacific Railroad (of Missouri) extends from St. Louis to the State line at Kansas City; the Kansas Pacific Railway, late Union Pacific Eastern Division, is now in operation four hundred and five miles west from the same point of the boundary. The Missouri River Railroad, now operated in connection with the Missouri Pacific, continues that line up the river to Leavenworth; and the Missouri River, Fort Scott, and Gulf Railroad, running at present to Paola, forty miles south, is being pushed rapidly to the Indian Territory, and will become the great route from the North to the Southwest. On the opposite river-bank the North Missouri Railroad forms a second line to St. Louis; the Missouri Valley Railroad runs northward to St. Joseph; and the Kansas City and Cameron Railroad, forming part of the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad line, opens a direct route to Chicago. The bridge, now completed, was built by the last-named road, and will enable the seven roads to unite at common points within the city.

The location of the bridge, as shown in the accompanying topographical sketch, is opposite the town, and immediately below a bend in the river. It was begun in January, 1867. In February Mr. CHANUTE, the chief engineer, took charge of the works. In the spring the enterprise was interrupted by a high flood, and it was not until August that work could be resumed. The south abutment of the bridge was placed eighty feet back from the face of the bluff, and from it a sixty-six foot span extends over a street and the track of the Missouri Pacific Railroad to a pair of pillars standing near the edge of the rock-face; a span of one hundred and thirty-three feet reaches from them to pier No. 1, the first river-pier. A pivot-draw of two spans, each one hundred and sixty feet in the clear, and three hundred and sixty-three feet long over all, from centre to centre of piers 1 and 3, turns upon pier No. 2, which is placed as nearly as possible in the centre of the channel. Pier No. 4 was located two hundred and fifty feet beyond No. 3; No. 5, two hundred feet farther north, on the edge of the sand-bar; and two spans, two hundred, and one hundred and seventy-seven feet respectively, cover the distance remaining to pier No. 7, which stands on the edge of the wooded shore, taking the place of a north abutment. The railroad is then carried over the bottom-land on two thousand three hundred and sixty feet of trestle-work, descending one foot in a hundred to an embankment. The carriage-way is carried down on a heavier grade by a side-trestle. The difficulties attending the building of this bridge were wholly in the foundations. The length of the structure is one mile.

The masonry of all the piers is of limestone, quarried in the neighborhood, the facing being of ashlar and the backing of heavy rubble. The ashlar of the upper courses, above the ice-breaker, is of a good blue-stone, of uniform color, and the stones used below are of a greyish tint. The piers finish eleven feet higher than the great flood of 1844, and forty-eight feet above the lowest water observed. The total height of pier No. 4, from rock to coping, is eighty-nine feet. The pivot-pier is circular in form and twenty-nine feet in diameter, finishing thirty-two feet on top.

The entire structure was completed by July 3, 1869, and the event was celebrated by the citizens of Kansas City with the greatest enthusiasm.

TROLLING ON THE ST. LAWRENCE.

AT this season of the year the fishing stations on the St. Lawrence River are generally crowded with pleasure-seekers from all our principal cities. In fair weather the stream appears thronged with fishing boats, trolling among the Thousand Islands for pickerel, bass, pike, and muskinonge. The latter is the "heroine of the waters," and if an adventurer succeeds in getting one on his hook that weighs from 20 to 60 pounds, he becomes a hero and excites the envy of his brother sportsmen. The capture is rather difficult, and it requires an experienced hand to manage the victim, which, if large and saucy, has to be worried out or drowned—an operation which sometimes takes half an hour. Alexandria Bay, Clayton, and Fisher's Landing are the principal stopping-places for visitors, who can easily find fishing apparatus and boats, with good oarsmen to accompany them on their excursions.

A SUMMER EVENING ON THE BOULEVARDS IN PARIS.

THOUGH a great part of the fashionable society of the French capital has already taken flight to cool itself in the baths and watering-places, the nightly promenade along the Boulevards is yet frequented by a throng of all classes of pleasure-loving people. We present, in the engraving on another page, an illustration of this lively scene, where the pavement in front of one of the superbly decorated cafés is crowded with men and women in their gayest outdoor dress; some of them seated at the little movable tables for the consumption of ices, coffee, or more stimulating liquors; others strolling up and down, chatting with each other, or gazing at the passers-by; here and there a bustling bare-headed garçon, eagerly attentive to the wants and purses of his customers. Among these groups is a man with a couple of little lapdogs for sale, one of which is likely to be purchased, as we see, by a kind papa and mamma for the gratification of their little girl. The gas-lights and the foliage of the trees on the right hand, with the tall house-fronts on the left, will show to the reader who knows Paris the locality at which this sketch was made.

A SCENE AT SARATOGA DURING THE VISIT OF THE SEVENTH REGIMENT.—[DRAWN BY THOMAS NAST.]

AN INCREDIBLE STORY.

[EDITOR'S NOTE.—Notwithstanding that the author has entitled this "An Incredible Story," the details of the narrative are by no means impossible. Without mentioning the numerous well-authenticated cases of double consciousness on record, we will refer our readers to the single instance of MARY REYNOLDS, as given upon competent authority, in Harper's Magazine for May, 1860. Miss Reynolds not only entered upon a second life, in which the memory of the past was totally obliterated, but her temperament and disposition were wholly altered by the change.]

I.—"SHE IS NOT DEAD, BUT SLEEPETH."

THE fierce rays of an almost tropical sun at high noon slanted through the open windows of Magnolia Cottage, where Heinrich von Wetzlar stood by the bedside of his deceased wife. His little daughter Annette—a girl of five years—stood at his side; but, for all that, he was alone—alone, though a troop of men and angels had surrounded him; for what can disturb the desert solitude which Death flings about itself on a broad mantle, and about all who enter its precincts? The very fullness of life on that summer noon, hints of which were borne through the windows with the stately sighings of the wind and the fragrance of Southern flowers, intensified and heightened, by contrast, the rigor and abysmal silence of that slumber upon which Von Wetzlar intently gazed.

That terrible scourge of New Orleans—the yellow-fever—had visited the city with unusual severity. Magnolia Cottage was situated in one of the least crowded quarters of the city; yet this locality had not escaped the fate of the others. Von Wetzlar's young wife had devoted herself day after day to visiting and nursing the sick in her neighborhood, until she herself was stricken down by the disease, of which she soon became a victim. Even had in its quiver no arrow so poignant as this which suddenly pierced the heart of the fond husband.

Heinrich von Wetzlar was a German, of Hebrew lineage on his father's side. His father, Otto von Wetzlar, had resided in Louisiana for a short time, years ago, and had there married Heinrich's mother, but immediately after this event had returned to his home in Vienna. While Heinrich was a mere boy his mother died; the frail Southern lady pined in vain for her genial native air. Then Otto von Wetzlar married again. This second wife—step-mother to the motherless boy—proved a curse to Otto's declining years. Partly to escape her tyranny, and partly moved by the remembrance of his mother's glowing pictures of Southern life, young Heinrich fled from Vienna to Italy, where he devoted himself to art. Dreamer and poet he had always been. His temperament, inherited from his mother, inclined to contemplation: his large, lustrous, hazel eyes betokened at once the passionate eagerness of inquiry and a disposition toward mysticism. His keen analysis drove him from all the ordinary positions quietly assumed by the mass of men as to the great questions affecting human life and destiny; but, as if finding no rest beyond these landmarks, his soul seemed to wander ever in that shadowy borderland where the real blends so readily with the ideal, and the visible receives the mantle of the invisible.

"THERE, ALMOST AT HIS SIDE, STOOD THE LIVING FORM OF LOUISE!"

After a residence of some years in Italy he was seized with an irresistible desire to visit his mother's native land. He came to New Orleans, and there, encouraged by the patronage of a few friends who had known his father, he easily contrived to satisfy his material wants, which were few and simple. Here he met Louise Darvon. At this time he was over thirty, while she was only sixteen. She was a simple French maiden of Huguenot ancestry—a girl who could scarcely have attracted attention by her beauty; and her parents were plain people with moderate means. Her education had been of the simplest sort, and she had none of that distingué style which often in the world's estimate supplies the want both of wealth and beauty. But Heinrich von Wetzlar judged not after the way of the world. He had lived for the most part a solitary life. He was now in the prime of manhood, but the dreams of his youth still lingered with him, though his youthful enthusiasm had been tempered by a ripened judgment.

Heinrich and Louise seemed to be spiritual counterparts; and there was a rare completeness, therefore, in their marriage. She was simple, earnest, and pure in heart. He was noble, and inspired in her a sense of grandeur. His wonderful subtlety of thought, his wealth of emotion, and the spirituality of his nature introduced her into a new world, where he was always her teacher. She could liken him to no one she had ever seen or heard of, until he told her of Mendelssohn, whose music they interpreted together, and some of whose heavy productions he read to her—then she thought he must be like Mendelssohn. Their chief delight was in music, which became to them a sort of universal language. His very conversation seemed to echo to grand old Hebrew melodies, and as she listened it seemed as if the winds wafted fragrance and repose to her from distant Palestine. If her spirit soared to meet his, so that her love was almost adoration, it was also true that his grand sympathies found through her humble, womanly charity a way to their expression in the trodden ways of life.

This beautiful life they had lived together for six years, and now the end had come. Von Wetzlar was startled, bewildered, stunned. It was as if the repose of heaven had been broken. The dearness of this woman and his need of her had never before been so sensibly felt. He stood upon the brink of an abyss which his thoughts—subtle and deep as they were—could not compass or fathom. His soul was moved to its depths. To such men the tragedy of such infinite loss is not simply solemn. It is a great Agitator. It is not strange, therefore, that to Von Wetzlar, in the presence of this mighty sorrow, the great problem of human destiny—as it seemed to him—namely, the question of a future life, presented itself anew. But, eager as were the questionings of his soul, he seemed confronted by a sphinx that answered only in riddles. The suggestions of his intellect seemed almost cruel, intruding as they did into the sacred prescience-chamber of his tenderest emotions.

"Is this the end?" he asked. "In the midst of all this life has my Louise dropped as do the flowers, to fall away into a mere heap of dust? Even the crazy old alchemists had a fancy that, by some magical process, they could restore from the dust of the rose at least its phantom—a semblance of the real flower. Is not the Divine chemistry as potent as that? It can not be that my rose is lost to me forever!" He reviewed in thought the testimony of the race: he recalled Plato and the sublime passages in Paul's epistle to the Corinthians. Then that movement of the glorious oratorio of the "Messiah" swept over his soul—so susceptible to the impressions of music—"I know that my Redeemer liveth." But still he was not satisfied. The calm surface of his thoughts had been disturbed by the heavy plummet of Death, and the waves still undulated in ever-widening circles toward an uncertain shore. Oh, if the Master could have spoken to his heart as he did to the house of Jairus, "She is not dead, but sleepeth!"

II.—ANALYTIC.

The dead in this time of peril were hurriedly buried. As the sun declined the face of Louise, after receiving the last fond kisses of the husband and daughter, was hid from their view, and they followed her to her resting-place in the French cemetery.

Two men met the sombre cortège as it returned from the cemetery whose characters must here be described. They were not together, but met with precisely at different angles of approach.

One of these was Doctor Eugene Gurdon, who had just issued from his library in his mansion on Carondelet Street. Each by his own and his walk it could be seen that he was a fastidious gentleman of easy manners and perfect self-possession. In his visual and mental constitution he was very much of a Parisian. He was a passionate lover of the beautiful, and shrunk from ugliness and deformity in almost a shuddering way. In this man, to whom disease was disgusting, made little great study of the life. This love of the beautiful spent no small portion of his time in anatomical dissections. The sight of pain was a torment, but he was so skilled in its alleviation that he was the most promising young surgeon in New Orleans.

As he met the procession, and could see through the windows of the leading carriage the sorrow-stricken faces of Von Wetzlar and his little girl, his sympathy was touched, and he said to himself, "Alas, how sad!" and the frequency of such spectacles in those death-crowded days did not diminish the profoundness of his sympathy. Looking into his naturally cheerful, but now somewhat pensive face, and into his clear gray eyes that almost changed their color under the influence of emotion, you would have said, "This man is a child of nature—open as may rarely are in a material influence, simply and subtle. His smile answers to the faintest gleam of sunlight and his heart is swept by cloud and storm; and although he is so much of a philosopher, his philosophy affords no shield to cover, no mask to disguise his susceptibility.

The other man to whom we alluded was Pierre Martin. As he met the procession he also looked upon the face of his chief mourners, and knew that Louise von Wetzlar had been buried. He gazed with stolid indifference upon the insignia of their grief and woe. He had once been a lover of Louise—if any thing could be called love which was clerished in Martin's heart: it was certainly a fierce and selfish devotion—one that had ever entered there. But she, with that unerring intuition which belongs to such pure, spiritual natures, had revoked him from the first, until at length his passionate love had been turned to bitter hate.

Martin was a thoroughly selfish man. He was endowed with a very fair exterior, with a strong physique, and with consummate impudence. He loved intrigue, and delighted in playing upon other men as upon the strings of an instrument. He had acted upon the stage, had written stray articles for the press, and was now a sort of attaché to the Medical College which he had attended some years before, and where he still lingered, not as a student, but upon good terms with all.

He had been smarting along the street, but as the procession passed him his steps were arrested as by some suddenly conceived purpose. "Ah!" he said to himself—"a capital idea! Bold—but why not? Faint heart never won fair lady. Eh, let us see!" and he turned down toward the river, still chuckling to himself as one might over some splendid joke. Reaching the levee, his attention was directed toward a group of men hanging about the mouth of a cave where by a steamer that to-morrow was to take departure for the distant port of ——. Martin then followed in low tones between Martin and two or three of this group whom he had drawn aside. Some agreement was completed, apparently, for as Martin left them he slipped a few gold pieces into their hands.

When the Doctor Gurdon he was on his way to a remote and solitary cottage in the outskirts of the city, occupied by a young medical student, whose name was Spaulding, and who was a friend and protégé of the Doctor's. This youth subjected the Doctor into a parlor where three or four students were evidently awaiting him. This was the "Curdon clique," which pursued investigations on its own account: it was a kind of opposition circle related to the regular sections of the College. The Doctor was to lecture to this select company this evening on the Structure of the Human Brain; and Pierre Martin had engaged to provide a suitable "subject" for additional investigations in the apartment adjoining the parlor, and which was known as the "Dissecting-Room." He had provided a "subject" in his own peculiar manner.

Doctor Gurdon entered upon his preliminary lecture, which was interesting and decidedly original. An hour passed. It was tedious to him, and no advices had been received from Martin. But the topic of the evening was one of absorbing interest, and the Doctor continued his lecture. His mind was abundantly stored with narrative of peculiar psychological experiences illustrating his theories. After nineteen minutes a knock at the outer door was recognized as Martin's. The long-expected body-snatcher was hurriedly transferred to the dissecting-room, where the inventory pantical was opened by Spaulding and Martin. Two dark blue eyes slowly opened that should have been forever sealed, and Pierre Martin was confronted by a living face that should have belonged to the dead. He gave one look of astonishment and terror, and then, without a word, fled from the house as if pursued by a phantom.

The other students were abruptly dismissed without knowing the details, and Spaulding and Doctor Gurdon were left alone with their strange and unaccountable proceeding Subject.

III.—THE SECOND LIFE.

A TRANSFORMATION had been wrought—a miracle scarcely less wonderful than that of resurrection. It was not simply the awakening, as from a sleep, of one who had seemed dead, and who had been laid away for an everlasting slumber. It was a new life. The eyes of Louise de Pierre Martin had not recognized him. The world upon which they opened seemed as new as it does to a new-born babe. The past to this awakened stranger was literally a blank. This woman was mentally an infant. The words which fell from her ever-moving lips seemed to, and she could utter none in reply. She was carried away in a carriage, which Spaulding had procured, to Doctor Gurdon's house, where she was placed in the care of the Doctor's housekeeper—the only other occupant of his house. In all matters relating to nursing, indeed, except as to her age—she was a child; though she learned more rapidly than a child could have done.

Doctor Gurdon's mansion was well suited to his character. It was costly and beautiful, was furnished with a taste and grace that the most refined taste could suggest or that wealth made possible, and was surrounded by a luxuriant grounds. It was in this bright home of luxury and art that his "patient" began her new life. The Doctor at first regarded her case as simply a mental interest. She was a case inviting study. He studied it. Very soon, however, science yielded to sympathy. The new Louise—as she had been; now she was gay. She has been deep-natured; now the movement of her thoughts was like a rippling brook. The change could not be more happily expressed than by likening it to the transformations which have affected whole races, and upon which Tacitus made Pelagius life into their Hellenic or artistic era. Only those were gradual changes as compared with that sudden and instantaneous mental transformation which had been effected.

It is not wonderful that Doctor Gurdon found in this woman a study. It is not that his studies grew to have an additional interest from the beginning of love for her in his heart. Such a humorous fit thought of her, and he was puzzled. He did not even know her name. Who had she been? Doctor Gurdon was no clairvoyant. She remembered absolutely nothing. It is true, however—and this should be mentioned here for the benefit of those interested in the psychological features of her case—it is true that when she happened to be in places that ought to have seemed familiar there often came to her an instense a vague shadow of reminiscence—something that could scarcely be called an impression. It was so faint and indefinite that Louise, who she haunted by this ghost of reminiscence when she was in the French cemetery (it was there that the heaven-born flash of memory), which the quite frequently visited during the summer that followed her strange resurrection. This puzzled her, and caused her to think about the place, as one which was in some way connected with the inexplicable wonder of her life. But the idea was so faint and shadowy as the fragrance of the flowers that decorated the tombs around her.

Doctor Gurdon had never told her of even the single fact of which he was himself aware. He intimated that she had been ill, and had been placed in his charge, and that her memory seemed to be dim or not could not lend her name even. With this she was forced to be content. She knew that the Doctor loved her, and she was perfectly happy in loving him.

But he was troubled by a horrible doubt. He feared some psychological mystery of this new life—either through her return to her former mental state, or through some intrusive claim from others who had known her in the past—that might cover her present retreat. He therefore gardened her most jealously, and felt anxious when she was out of his sight. And this fear of hers was Pierre Martin, who must be able, he thought, to bridge over the hiatus between the two lives of this woman.

IV.—THE TOKEN.

HEINRICH VON WETZLAR, since the loss of his wife, had again become a recluse. A year had passed, and still the sharpness of his grief had not been diminished. Notwithstanding his doubts in regard to the reality of a future life, he felt that a superstitious affirmative argument now existed for him in the necessity of another world to his individual soul, since his Louise belonged to that world.

The old desire to wander had returned, and he contemplated an early departure for Europe. With this in view he went, toward the close of a summer afternoon, to visit the French cemetery for the last time.

This cemetery was peculiar. The dead there were not interred underground, but laid away in vaults, one above another, on either side of a long aisle, whose entrance one might look upon the outer gates of these silent chambers of the dead, with decorations of flowers and crosses resting upon their projecting marble sills. Along this aisle Von Wetzlar walked until he came before the chamber allotted to his wife. As he halted and gazed upon the portal, stooping somewhat as he leaned upon his staff, one could see that he had grown many years older since that marble entablature had sealed from his vision the dear companion of his soul. As he gazed he seemed to be transported back to that summer noon, a year ago, when the shock of death first fell upon his heart, and his soul was not less agitated as it had been then. At first the marble repose of the place, though in some sort a mockery, soothed and invited him. Then the suggestions of life that were thrown out even here seemed to answer his old doubts and to give him hope. The slumbering roses and the trailing ivy towerèd above the stony silence, as if hinting of ever-flowing change, as if whispering that "Death is the gate of place of rest! For see! out of the very dust life rises tremblingly but triumphantly over the mask of Death."

He remained there in the same idea of life and motion, as contrasted with deathlike stillness, had once occurred to him in reading that passage in Dante Gurdon's poem, where Dante describes the cave of the Naiads. It all came back to him now—the picture of the Naiads weaving their dance at long-drawn looms, and of the wild bees humming and honey-making round caps and casks of stone, while evergreen vines waves overhead and broke on the stony floor.

The fading sunlight flashed across the dear name in the marble, and Von Wetzlar still gazed intently as if there were something still to come, and for which he waited. Might not the living Louise be removed but for one moment! And, as if in answer to his thought, there, in the clear light of day, almost at his feet, was the living form of Louise! There she stood, with one finger raised to her forehead as if she were trying to solve some hard riddle—with a look of deep moment, and often fixed on a haunted corridor.

As for Von Wetzlar, astonished at this heaven-sent token, he was overcome by awe, and overwhelmed with the ecstasy of that glorious moment, he sank to his knees and buried his face in his hands. When he left the cemetery a few minutes later his face beamed with the smile of assured hope.

The next day he sailed for Europe; and on the very evening of his departure Doctor Gurdon gave his own name to the nameless woman who had fallen so strangely in his way.

V.—THE END.

DOCTOR GURDON had rightly conjectured that Pierre Martin knew his wife's past history. But he had not met Martin since that memorable night at Spaulding's; he had simply watched him diligently. Yet the object of his search had all the while been hovering closely about, and had had his eyes upon him. He had not recognized both of the Doctor and of his patient. It was better that it was so at this time for—now that the developments are over which he had kept watch had been fully matured, and the marriage had taken place.

Martin's original scheme, conceived on that evening when he had employed the sailors to assist him in carrying out its design, had contemplated nothing beyond the satisfaction of his malice toward Von Wetzlar and his wife. He had been, indeed, confounded at first by what the result of that night's work; and after his astonishment had somewhat subsided he was led by curiosity to see what would follow. He can easily imagine his surprise at the ensuing events, and especially at the marriage. Why had not Louise died? These vehement passions seem to be free from restraint. Why had she not returned to her proper husband? Was she capable of such a fall? As a watching Fate, at a distance, he could not answer these questions.

Martin's plans were soon formed. Doctor Gurdon was a wealthy man—poor devil, as he called himself, was in need of money. By working upon the Doctor's fears he might put money in his own purse. Was he himself—poor Martin—to be the sacrificial victim? He was an impenetrable mystery! A few weeks after the wedding Martin appeared at the Doctor's house to pay his respects to the bride and bridegroom. To his astonishment (was there no end of wonders?) he did not know him. She seemed to him more beautiful and fascinating than ever in the old time. She was the same, yet not the same. Her dress, her air, her whole expression had changed. It was the old flower with a new and different fragrance. While he stood entranced under the spell of memories and the touch of the Doctor's hand upon his shoulder, followed by the request for a private interview in the library, he suddenly accosted, and a few words from the Doctor explained the situation.

"You know, Martin," inquired the Doctor, unsteadily—"you know who this woman was?"

"Yes, I know something; not much; but the disclosure of that little is a serious affair for me.

"It may be serious for me too. And inquire as your information may be it is invaluable to me. I would give thousands to know all, even the worst."

"Oh, it is not so very bad, Doctor. You see, she has not left the inmate of an insane asylum for a number of years, under the fever, died suddenly, and was buried. You know the rest."

This frank statement of Martin's, Doctor Gurdon's fears, and his gratitude for relief made him generous. So that this brief interview satisfied Martin's cupidity as well as his curiosity, and he left the house with a valuable check in his portemonnaie, one that would go a great way, spendthrift though he was.

But he could not keep away from the larger prize. If the Doctor could win Louise, why need he despair? Was she not dead and buried in the grave? Did she not belong to him? Then, he remembered, she had not shown toward him any of that repugnance which she had formerly exhibited. In a short time they even became friends, and the Doctor was compelled to suffer this for fear of offending one whom, in his heart, he despised. Evidently, whatever Louise had gained in her new life, she had lost those spiritual intuitions which had guided and guarded her in her first estate.

As Martin's power over Louise increased, so also did his hold upon her husband. He professed to be making a more accurate investigation as to Louise's antecedents. Little by little the truth came out—that she had been Heinrich von Wetzlar's wife. At first the Doctor would not believe it. But one day Martin took him to the French cemetery, and showed him the empty tomb. What was done in order to obtain more money; but this time the attempt was vain. The Doctor, amazed and bewildered, hurried home. He knew he owed the life of his library in a frenzy of agony. He loved Louise as his own soul. He could not give her up; and when he could not endure to her happiness to be restored to a life as alien to her as if it had never been hers. He went out into the open air. The sound of voices in the street as he walked down the garden walk, attracted his attention. As he approached, unseen, he recognized the voices; they were Martin's and Louise's. He listened. It was evidently a leave-taking. Were Louise lost? By power through the influences of the vine-clusters, and saw Martin standing by the side of Louise with his arm about her waist, and heard him ask, as he looked pleadingly down upon her innocent, upturned face,

"Shall it be to-morrow, dearest?"

In a moment Doctor Gurdon stood within the arbor. Before those cool, searching gray eyes Martin winced, released his hold upon Louise, and slunk away without one word.

And she—she simply cast upon the recreant one look of scorn and infinite loathing. The serpent, that just now moment had been coiled so bold and beautiful with its shining crest, had resumed its natural habit, and was revealed as a loathsome thing. Louise had turned to reward; and she hated him. Turning to the Doctor she fell powerless into his arms.

And as he stood there, holding her to his bosom, he knew for the first time how deeply and tenderly he loved her. And he did her justice. She had erred, but it was not known before. She had been simply a child in all this—free but guiltless. This second life, which she had lived before him and with him, was as pure and holy as that of childhood, but also as undisciplined. It was a life in which all that was beautiful and strong in the affections of a child had found expression, but in which experience had furnished no principles for guidance and on test against disguised villainy. His own influence over her, and all the circumstances with which he had surrounded her, had led to the development of such a life, and with just that one woeful deficiency.

While he thought thus she lay prostrate and nerveless in his arms. Gradually she began to realize her husband's presence. Then her apathy gave way to convulsive sobbing.

"Oh! take me away, Eugene; take me any where; I can not stay here!" she cried.

"Yes, darling, I will take you away," he said, kindly. "I have been away myself, for a while, on a dream. It is all over now." And he carried her to her own room, where he left her in the care of his faithful old housekeeper.

Yes, he must go away—away from Martin, away from that cenotaph in the cemetery, the existence of which was photographically in his memory forever. It was now more than a year since his marriage, and a little daughter had been born to him; and she was another reason for flight.

In a few days Doctor Gurdon had secretly disposed of his estate; and one evening, with his wife and his infant daughter, accompanied by the housekeeper, now little Gertrude's nurse, he embarked for the North on a Mississippi steamer.

Two days later, as he was sitting under the guard enjoying his cigar and congratulating himself upon his happy escape from the troubles which had lately beset him, he looked around, and at his side stood Pierre Martin! They were alone. Louise was in her state-room. Even in despair, the Doctor seized his tormentor around the waist and tried to throw him overboard. A struggle ensued, which resulted fatally for both of the combatants. They went overboard, each grappling the other in a death-struggle. A deserted boat was near, which Gurdon's sister-in-law from the window of which she had witnessed the fatal termination of the conflict. She was found among the floor of her room apparently lifeless.

Every effort was made to recover Martin and Gurdon, but in vain. Both had evidently been drowned.

For hours Louise remained in a trance-like swoon. When she awoke she did not recognize either her children or her sister. She did understand where she was, but murmured, "Heinrich—oh, Heinrich! where are you?" She was found among Louise von Wetzlar's papers, and in her thoughts was back in Magnolia Cottage. "I have been ill," she murmured. "Who are you? and where is Heinrich?" Gradually the cold nurse communicated to her the events of the past two years, so far as she knew them, and Louise comprehended not one word. There was some dreadful mistake; she knew nothing of Doctor Gurdon, or, indeed, of any thing that was told her. Every yesterday was a mystery to her, she was nursing the sick in New Orleans. It was long before she could believe in a life of which her consciousness gave no testimony. She finally found in Doctor Gurdon's trunk a statement which he had prepared, based upon Martin's story and his own investigations. She learned from this that Von Wetzlar had sold Magnolia Cottage—her parsonage having fallen victim to the yellow-fever shortly after her own supposed death—and that he had gone to Europe.

Him she determined to find if the search consumed all that remained to her of life. For her child's (Gertrude's) sake she retained Doctor Gurdon's property, which was already in her possession, he having converted it all into ready money before his flight; she also kept the old housekeeper as nurse for Gertrude.

We need not follow in detail her search for her husband, which was continued during several years. She went to Vienna, to Rome, and almost over the entire Continent; to the East, to England; and at last, when she had given them up in despair, she one day found him almost by accident—or rather it should be said that little Annette von Wetzlar found her mother. This child had now grown into a girl of twelve years, and was staying with her father in the English Quarter of Frankfort-on-the-Main. One evening at sunset her attention was attracted by a bright little girl of about six years of age who was walking by with her old nurse, whom she was teasing by the sauciest gambols. Annette ran up to her and gave her some flowers, receiving a kiss in return, and an invitation to call and see her at her own home. Annette visited her the next day, and in the garden found a step-sister. She also found her own mother. They recognized each other at the first, and Annette took her mother home with her. She spoke to her father at first, that he might not be entirely unprepared.

"Oh, papa," she cried, as she entered his studio; "I have found mamma, and she is here."

He dropped his pencil and rose to his feet, and there she was before him—his lost Louise. He had no time for astonishment, for her arms were in a moment clinging about his neck, and they were laughing and crying all in one breath.

The two step-sisters, Gertrude and Annette, still live together at Frankfort. Louise is dead; but Von Wetzlar still lives, and is preparing a grand philosophical treatise on the Individual Human Consciousness, in which, as may be easily imagined, he considers that element of life to have been very much overestimated in its importance as a factor in its connection with the vaster cycles of existence.

HON. HENRY T. BLOW,

UNITED STATES MINISTER TO BRAZIL.

THE banquet given to Hon. HENRY T. BLOW, on the 13th of July, in the magnificent dining-rooms of the Southern Hotel, St. Louis, had more than a local significance. It partook of a national, and even of an international character. The very ornamentation of the hall, the intertwining of the Brazilian and the American flag, the mingling of the flora of the Amazon and of the Mississippi, but, more than all, the presence of the Brazilian Minister Plenipotentiary, Senor MAGALHAES (the LONGFELLOW of South America), and other members of the Legation of Brazil, were significant of harmony and good-will between the first nations of the Western Continent. Among the numerous guests were Senators and Representatives of our Congress, Governors, and officers of our army from every portion of our land, as well as the very élite of St. Louis, irrespective of political views.

They met to honor one who (as was well said by one of the speakers) "was to represent, in the great Empire of Brazil, the country which he had so zealously and ably served at home; to uphold her honor, to advance her interests, to increase and develop her commercial relations, and to establish sentiments of concord and good-will between her people and those of that youthful and vigorous Empire, whose future seems scarcely less grand than that of our own republic."

Mr. BLOW, on the part of these friends, has indeed done the state some service—as a private citizen, eminent for his enterprise and broad views, as a patriot in trying times, as a member of Congress, and as a minister abroad. He is a native of Southampton, Virginia, but moved when quite young to Alabama. In 1841 he went to St. Louis. He early became interested in mining lands of immense value, and by manufactures and by mines he has accumulated a large fortune.

One would have judged, from his birth and associations with the South (spending many winters at New Orleans, etc., etc.), that his sympathies would have been with the late rebellion. But he was among the first in Missouri to declare slavery inconsistent with republican institutions, and evinced his love of liberty and justice in early life, when he became the security of, and adopted the money to, Dred Scott, in order that that slave, whose name has become famous by his suit, might test the Constitution of this country in regard to the status of the black man. Mr. BLOW took a decided stand in the important events of Missouri during the rebellion. He was the friend and counselor of General LYON, and enjoyed the most confidential relations with Mr. LINCOLN. In 1862 he was sent as Minister, with extraordinary powers, to Venezuela, and filled his mission with such satisfaction that Mr. LINCOLN desired to give him a European mission; but, believing that he could serve his country better at home, Mr. BLOW returned to St. Louis, where, in 1863, he was elected by a large majority as Representative to Congress. In 1865 he was re-elected by such overwhelming odds that his opponent received but 1500 votes to Mr. BLOW'S 13,700. He was placed upon the two most important committees at the same time, viz., those of Ways and Means and of Reconstruction, and served on both with assiduity and acceptance.

Mr. BLOW, with his accomplished family, will do much as the representative of the United States to bind our country and Brazil in closer relations.

THE HEMPSTEAD PLAINS.

THE purchase of Hempstead Plains—a tract of land in the interior of Long Island, consisting of 7000 acres—by Mr. A. T. STEWART was notified by the citizens of Hempstead July 17. We give on this page a very full map of this region, showing its connection with Brooklyn and with New York. This tract cost Mr. STEWART $400,000; and we understand that it is his design to spend from six to ten millions of dollars in the erection upon it of homes for the workingclasses of New York and Brooklyn. This design is so gigantic that it throws into the shade every attempt of the kind hitherto made. The situation of the lands purchased is admirably adapted to the purpose contemplated. They are abundantly supplied with the purest water; the Ridgewood Water-works of Brooklyn are fed by the springs of this region. As will be seen by a glance at our map, the Long Island and the Southside railroads (with a branch road connecting them, and running across the Plains) afford unusual facilities for communication with the two neighboring cities. With the improvements which Mr. STEWART will carry out, with a township of beautiful and healthful homes; with parks, gardens, and public buildings for educational purposes and for those of amusement, Hempstead Plains, hitherto a desert, will be made to blossom as the rose, and to be a most beautiful suburb in the vicinity of New York. God speed the undertaking!

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

How shall we keep cool—that is, as cool as it is possible to do—during the next few weeks? People are constantly thinking how hot it is; they fan themselves violently, thus heating the blood ten times more by the exercise than is cooled by the chilled breeze; then they drink some ice-water, or some soda-water; then they say, "How dreadfully hot it is!" and they abandon all idea of doing any thing but try to keep cool; and it is this persistent effort to keep cool that makes every body so supremely warm. The discomfort from heat is largely the result of a sort of nervous impatience that it is not cold. Let it be hot; but thinking about it all the time makes it hotter. A few simple rules should be observed during the "heated term." The food should be light, and chiefly fruits and vegetables. The dress, of course, should be light, and often changed—nothing worn during the day should be worn at night. Bathe frequently, but not to excess. Water will best quench the thirst, and if drunk sparingly is injurious. No one will adopt some such simple rules as these, and there quietly and steadily accept the mind with some topic more interesting than the heat, avoiding excitement, and enduring what must be endured with as little fuss as possible, he will find he suffers far less than if he spends the whole twenty-four hours in trying to keep cool.

The recent disaster which occurred on the Kansas Pacific Railroad appears to have originated in the effects of the late heavy rains on that section of the country. A bridge, only about thirty feet in length, which spanned a ravine from fifteen to twenty feet deep, was the scene of the disaster. The bridge and track were apparently in good order, but no sooner had the engine moved upon it than the bridge gave way and the locomotive was precipitated into the ravine, followed by the cars. The wreck was terrible, two persons being instantly killed and many severely injured. An examination after the accident showed that the piling-way of the bridge was caused by what is known as a "bent" having been wrested from under the trestlework by the flood caused by the heavy rains, and leaving this portion of the bridge unsupported. This was not perceptible before the accident occurred, and the track and bridge were apparently intact. The disaster is believed to have been purely accidental.

The Centennial Commencement of Dartmouth College was celebrated at Hanover on July 31 with great spirit and enthusiasm. The occasion brought together a multitude of the alumni and others from all parts of the country. A large tent, capable of holding three thousand persons, was erected on the Common, and was densely packed with the graduates and the friends of the College. Many distinguished men were present, among whom was General Sherman. The morning exercises consisted of an address of welcome by President Smith, an historical address by President Brown, of Hamilton College, and the singing of an original ode by one of the alumni. In the afternoon Chief Justice Chase delivered an address, which was followed by a poem. During the latter exercises Hanover was visited by one of the most violent storms ever known in the region, which caused an abridgment of the performances.

Race-horses from all parts of the country are now daily arriving at Saratoga. The fashionable world is also turning its face Saratoga-ward. August will bring great excitement—racing, gambling, and betting, in addition to the usual programme of drinking, dressing, and dancing.

Buffalo Bayou is to be made longer and deeper, to accommodate the increasing commerce of the lakes and canals. The work of excavating the rock has already commenced, and it is proposed to excavate to a sufficient depth to allow vessels to load with coal at their docks.

It is comforting during this hot season to be assured that the filthy streets in many parts of our city are receiving some special attention from the Sanitary Superintendents, and that lime, coal-tar, and creosote have been scattered abroad with a liberal hand. It is to be hoped that these cleansing processes will continue to go on ad infinitum.

We learn from an exchange that the famed American painter, BIERSTADT, has met with great success in Paris this year. His salon at the Grand Hotel has been a most interesting place both in a social and in an artistic point of view. Celebrities from all quarters of the globe have gathered there. Among the new paintings of this artist is "The Bridal Veil," a view of the Yosemite Valley—a superb work, which was commenced at Rome and completed in Paris. Another painting of great power is "A Scene on the Prairie." We understand from family friends of Mr. BIERSTADT that he is expected to return to America about this time; and that he has work in hand, and planned for the future, sufficient to occupy his time for some years.

We may expect that some of our art galleries will open rare attractions in the fall. Mr. Knoedler and Mr. Schaus are in Europe, and have already purchased many fine paintings, which are on their way to this country.

A French journal hints that if one desires to write a document so as to render attempts at altering impossible, it is to be done by steeping paper in a very weak solution of gallic acid. A writing surface is thus obtained upon which ordinary ink makes a mark that defies decided essence or aftertouch, by rendering any attempt at such easily detectable.

The great centre of interest at Long Branch last week was Secretary FISH. He and his family were located at the Stetson House, but every thing concerning them went on in the most quiet and unostentatious manner. The President was desirous of quiet and rest, and evidently designs to secure it if other people do not. Among the notables were Spinola, the cigar, drives, dines, bathes, and walks on the beach, and with his family joins the social circle in the drawing-room occasionally. Secretary BOUTWELL and the gentleman would do who wishes to refresh himself by a visit at Long Branch.

The Sultan has decided to be present at the opening of the Suez Canal, on the 17th of November next, and his movements are the matter of intense interest to many. The Minister of Finance has received an order to place 13,000,000 francs at the disposal of the Treasurer of the Privy Purse, and this sum very likely will be devoted only to preparations for the journey.

Magazine literature is the rage in London. No less than six hundred and sixty-five magazines, including quarterlies, are now published in Great Britain. But little more is to be expected from the advent of the periodical, just as often the record of a deceased magazine is made. Over three hundred more magazines are at present published in Great Britain. In this country there are thirty-five hundred, of which five-sevenths are issued in the Northern States.

A Christian bargain or sale is one in which there is neither cheating for profit nor crying for gain.

A Christian yard is thirty-six inches, and is not shortened by the handling of the stick.

A Christian pound weighs sixteen ounces, and is at least evenly balanced.

A Christian bushel contains 332 cubic inches, and is filled himself.

A Christian ton is 2000 pounds, and is not roughly judged, but conscientiously weighed.

It is currently reported that the Emperor of the French will confer the title of "Duke of Suez," on M. Ferdinand de Lesseps at the official opening of the Suez Canal, in commemoration of the successful completion of his great undertaking. M. de Lesseps was born at Versailles on November 19, 1805. Perhaps, if November 19 did not happen to come on a Friday this year, the birthday of the great engineer might have been celebrated by the opening of the Suez Canal, which would have been very pleasant and appropriate. But, doubtless, if the thing was thought of, popular prejudice against Friday prevailed—so the 17th of November is the great day of ceremonies.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE movement that was "on foot" has taken a carriage.

"I have very little respect for the ties of the world," as the chap said when the rope was put around his neck.

An intolerable bore, having talked a friend nearly out of his senses, at length broke out with "Do oyster," which he called "one of the most remarkable specimens of curtailed words extant," when his friend interrupted him, and "closed the debate," with the exclamation of, "The oyster! Ah, yes, the oyster is a glorious fellow; he always knows when to shut up!"

If the doctor orders pork, has not the patient a right to growl?

SONG OF A HORSE.

A poor old race-horse, lank and thin,
Not much else but bones and skin,
I jog along, week out week in,
Kicked and cursed and meanly fed,
Jammed in the side and jerked by the head.
And the thing I can't at all make out,
Is what on earth it's all about.
Why was I made to toil and tug
For this little old human hog,
Two-legged, dumpy as a jug,
Who sits aloft and rides to butter—
Or why was he made, for that matter?
And, if I recks must be recorded,
Why is it that I was not fated
To prance and curvet, finely-mated,
Silver-harnessed, sleek and fat,
In open coach and bowling, and all that?
Here I go, day after day,
Jumbling and slipping down Broadway,
Dragging these curious biped things,
With four-legs gone and with two wings.
Where they all go to I don't know,
Nor why in the world they hurry so,
Nor what good use Heaven puts them to!
It wasn't for this you see, at all,
That my joints grew big and my muscles small,
And so I think with a rich man's steed,
Pin clumsy, stupid, crooked, slow,
Yet the meanest horse in a dozen you know,
As well as the gloss'est mags that go.
O Lord! how long will they be use so?
And when may the equine spirit go
Where gentled horses dwell in a row,
Switching their bright tails to and fro,
Careless of human wheels or whip?
Where oats are always sprouting,
And then don't grow?
Oh no!
O!

"Why, Sambo, how black you are!" said a gentleman the other day to a negro waiter at a hotel. "How is that, sir?" said he, as he put on a look of surprise, "because I have preached so much without notes."

"Do you believe in the appearance of spirits, father?" asked a rather fast young man of his intelligent sire. "No, Tom, but I believe in their disappearance, and that very frequently." "Indeed!" replied the old gentleman.

A QUEER IDEA OF JUSTICE.—A blacksmith of a village in Spain murdered a man, and was condemned to be hanged. The chief peasants of the place joined together, and begged the alcalde that the blacksmith might not suffer, because he was necessary to the place, which could not get on without a blacksmith to shoe horses, mend wheels, etc. "But," said the alcalde, "there are in the village a fuller, a laborer answered, "Sir, there are two weavers in the village, and for so small a place one is enough; hang the other."

FLIRTATION.—[SEE POEM, PAGE 506.]

A SUMMER EVENING ON THE BOULEVARDS OF PARIS.—[See Page 500.]

FLIRTATION

See Illustration on page 504.

I.

FLIRTATION is a very pretty art:
And, on a pleasant summer afternoon,
What's nicer than, from others far apart,
To utter love's low tune?

II.

Or in a moonlit balcony to talk
Delicious nonsense insignificant,
While no weird phantoms of the future stalk,
And amorous bosoms pant?

III.

Pleasant but wrong. At least there are some children
Whom the delightful, difficult process hurts;
They find the practice of the art bewildering.
For there are flirts—and flirts.

IV.

Elderly girls there are, and widows clever,
Endowed with every gift save youth's soft charm,
Who very willingly would flirt forever,
Who can not come to harm.

V.

And let us warn the exquisite young creatures,
Fresh from the strawberries and cream, and fun,
That, when they flirt with fools of whiskered features,
Often some harm is done.

VI.

The innocent child meets with some idiot splendid
Who makes her warm white bosom palpitate—
But with the evening's talk the thing is ended,
And she is left to fate.

VII.

The empty-headed blockhead finds his victim
In eighteen-hundred-and-one summer's noon:
I wish her brother had been there, and kicked him
Into this week's cartoon.

SO RUNS THE WORLD AWAY.

CHAPTER XXXII.

HE WOULD AND HE WOULD NOT.

"WHO was that talking to you at the door?" Moore said, with a sudden flash of recollection, of some indistinct murmur which had seemed to come from the porch. "Was it Douglas? why didn't he come in and say good-night?"

The old man's utterance was so confused now that it required a practised ear to understand his meaning. Alcoholic intelligence was aided by her consciousness. "It wasn't Mr. Douglas," she stammered.

"It should have been Douglas," Moore mused; "who else should walk so late with you?"

"It was Captain Mowbray," she explained; "you know he was, daddy, don't you?"

Moore shook his head and looked at her fixedly; then his eyes and his thoughts wandered off somewhere into the dim realms of imperfect reason.

"What is it? what is vexing you, daddy?" the girl asked, caressing his hand.

He touched her hair softly, and said, "It's like Mary's."

Mary was his dead wife, long since forgotten by all excepting him, and even he only remembered her by fits and starts. Presently his thoughts reverted to his first question.

"I'm sure I heard some one whispering; why don't you tell me who it was, Azalea? It'd dreadful to hear things and not know what you're hearing."

"It was Captain Mowbray and myself," Azalea said, distressed at his manner, which seemed to be more than usually confused.

"I don't like it. I don't like it—harm will come of it. I shall see him, Azalea; you must ask him to come to me. I shall tell him to go away." And the thing how blank the girl's face grew at this suggestion, he went on: "I shall be happy then, dear; I'm so afraid he might harm you, and I'm not strong enough to help you." He cried a little as he lifted his hands feebly in illustration of his weakness.

The next morning Douglas came once more to Auriel. He had been away two or three days, and Azalea, though she commented on his absence, scarcely regretted it; he had become so stern, almost savage, in his manner, so abrupt and bitter that, without seeking to account to herself for his conduct, she shrank from him, and the face of the younger man seemed brighter and more goodly in her sight when contrasted with the other's fierce gray eyes and frowning brow. On this morning Douglas did not linger with Moore, as had been his habit ere seeking Azalea; he inquired for the girl at once, and hearing from old Sally that "Miss had gone to the apple-loft," he followed her thither.

"I am come to bid you good-by," he said, abruptly.

Azalea was indemnifying herself for her previous fast by a raid on her favorite fruit. With a half-eaten apple in one hand, with the other upholding an approval of the apple's compatriots, she sat in the doorway of the loft, her feet resting on one of the upper bars of the ladder, her hair blown in the wind and bright with sunlight.

"I am going away"—he paused—"for some time."

Such a yearning, wistful face it was that was upturned to hers.

"Going away?" she echoed; "and what will poor daddy do without you?"

He lowered his face that she might not see his visible disappointment.

"I shall be back as soon as possible," he said, presently. "You must tell Moore so, and explain to him the cause of my absence; I have no time to do so myself. There is a man whom I once knew—a comrade in my old hap-hazard life at the Cape; when I last saw him he was a model of manhood, tall, strong, gay, and combative: he is dying in an attic in London. He begged his way to this country to seek a relative, and has found a blank instead. His brother was dead; and now I am the only person in this country to whom he is not an utter stranger."

He held out his hand and paused, and as he looked at her the pain of his impending departure seemed intensified. It was all he could do to restrain himself from taking her in his arms and crying, "Love me; for pity's sake give me back a portion of my will!" As he lingered a footstep broke the silence, and Azalea, looking up with a vivid flush on her face, withdrew every thought from Douglas, his troubled journey, and its object, and was conscious only that the delicious new emotion in her life was before her, personified by the handsome, striding young man, who seemed in such perfect accord with the bright beauty of the morning.

Douglas looked at the girl in silence for a moment; then releasing Azalea's hand and nodding to Mowbray, he turned to go.

"Hallo! where are you off to?" Thurstan said, pleasantly.

"I am going to town, and am on my way to the station. Will you come a few steps with me?" Douglas answered, after a short pause.

"Delighted! Miss Moore, I'll be back directly, and have a go in at the apples."

The elder man moody and preoccupied, the younger one cheerful and unconcerned, went a few yards without speaking—Thurstan whistling a tune and swinging his cane. When they had arrived at the end of the avenue Douglas paused.

"Mowbray," he said, abruptly, "you were once kind enough to say you'd do any thing for me that lay in your power."

"So I would, old fellow," the other answered, heartily.

Douglas hesitated, then, without looking at his companion, said, slowly:

"I wish you would hunt more, and look at books and letters less; pumping a fox is a better day's work than hunting down a soul. Azalea is alone, and unprotected. Hitherto she has known neither evil nor selfishness. Remember me, Mowbray, that you will not harm a thing so defenseless. There are plenty of women in the modern Babylon, Mowbray, whom you can scarce by injure by your attentions. Honor this one by your neglect."

"I mean her no harm," Douglas echoed, bitterly.

"You mean her no harm!" Douglas echoed, bitterly. "I dare say not. People who mean no harm are the accomplices in every crime. What does it matter what the intention was, when the result is a life ruined or a soul depraved? Leave these evil tricks to women, Mowbray. You are a man, not a treacherous, vile girl be. She and her old father are the only friends I have on earth."

"I wish you wouldn't come down on a fellow so sharp," Captain Mowbray said, uncomfortably. "I not only don't mean, but won't do any harm; will that content you? I'll be going on to town shortly for a few days, and I will take that opportunity of slackening the intimacy a little. Let her down easy, in fact."

"You be d—d," muttered Douglas under his breath.

"Eh, what did you say?" asked his unconscious companion.

"I only wished to know when you were going?"

"Very soon; the fact is, Lady Di is in town, and—"

"What!" cried Douglas, in a tone of mingled scorn and wonder; "do you mean to say that Azalea has still any delusion for you?"

"Did any thing hold Delilah lovely even to the third treachery?" the younger man said, laughing. Then, with a change of manner, he took Douglas's hand.

"I will lay to heart what you have said. I confess it seems to be easy; you know it's best for her—and I owe you something. You may be easy in your mind. I give you my word Azalea shall meet no dishonor or disrespect at my hands. After I have gone a week she will probably forget my existence. Good-by."

How dear would have been the night Douglas, as he turned his steps toward the high-road, did she know that mine was the hand to break down the wall!

Yet his heart felt lighter than it had done for many days past. Love and selfishness are inexpugnable. Reason said, "It is for her sake." His heart confessed, "It is for mine."

Meanwhile Captain Mowbray returned to the apple-house, where Azalea was still perched high up against the lived wall. For a while he was content and quiescent, and stood at the foot of the ladder, meditatively pulling his mustache. Then he looked up at the girl and sighed; much such a sigh as a child might give out on being ordered not to touch forbidden dainties. She looked contrition and pity, but thought. But what pleasure does not seem at its zenith when it must perforce be resigned?

There was a pretty girl who, he felt sure, loved him (men "feel sure" on these subjects much sooner than women do, although we are accredited with the greater share of vanity), and he would like very much to take her in his arms, and say how "awfully fond he was of her," and how he had as good as promised he would throw her over. How on earth was he to explain his change of manner? It was only yesterday he had said he loved her, and now he was going away, to leave her for good and all—and he had never had kissed her kiss. He went a few steps up the ladder, and asked her to throw him some fruit.

She held out a basketful, and the contact of her bare, round arms with his sleeve brought him yet a few steps nearer to her. He had found it difficult to retain his coldness of manner when he was at the foot of the ladder; now the difficulty apparently became impossibility; for when he found himself opposite the lovely face he suddenly flung down the apples, and, forgetting all his resolutions, kissed her.

She looked astonished, startled, and on her was the hush of a great shame; but when her lover lowered him in her hands (for at the tender touch of innocent lips his boldness melted into a softer feeling), and craved pardon for his offense—which, in truth, he loved her—that she must forgive him—that he was a d—d good-for-nothing scoundrel—that he must leave her, it was hard to avoid her dear pretty—and might he kiss once more before he said good-by for good and all?—when he poured out all this with a sort of rough, confusing, Azalea only partially understood his meaning. She did not comprehend the vague self-accusation, or the shadowy allusions to his departure. She heard distinctly, "I love you—I love you." And then the sense of shame gave place to another feeling impossible to analyze. It was joy—joy like a child's, but intense as a woman's. A joy so indefinably sweet in its mysteriousness, so vivid in its quality, that for one rich minute she put one hand and stopped this golden hour in its progress. Why did not the bird stay its flight; the leaf rest on the bough; the insect hang motionless in mid-air? Why did not all Nature pause in sympathy with the charm by which she was spell-bound?

What could have been expected of this creature, who was little better than a dryad, than that she should be overcome by the autumn haze, and think that all the world should turn to gold like the beech, and hold its big breath with her trance!

Captain Mowbray took a more practical and ordinary view of what was to him a not uncommon event.

"What a fool I am!" he said to himself, ruefully, as he turned back to Holme that afternoon. "I might have known I shouldn't keep my word. But what a charming little mouth it is! Who could have such a pretty child? The devil of it is that I've promised to go there again to-morrow."

CHAPTER XXXIII.

AZALEA.

WHILE the two in the sunshine outside perplexed with love, George Moore was communing with death. When Azalea left her foster-father in the morning, he had spoken of his wife, more than usually well and cheerful, watching with interest the eccentric motions of a kitten, beating time with his fingers when the clock chimed, and mumbling various directions to old Sally, who rejoiced in Master Moore's asperity, taking it as a sign that he "must be feeling better, poor dear."

The change came suddenly at last. When Azalea returned to the apple-house she said, with a sudden pang of disquietude:

"I don't think he seems so well as usual, Sally; do you?"

And Sally, better accustomed to symptoms of disease, shook her head.

"I have sent for him to send the little boy who brought the milk to the doctor's to ask him if he can't step this way presently. According to my thinking, Miss Azalea, Master Moore won't trouble us long."

The old woman meant no unkindness. She only spoke according to her manner of her class. To the poor, who have to grapple with life as with an enemy, death does not wear so harsh an aspect as he does to those more pampered and ardent; but her words sounded horrible to Azalea.

With the touched of all its glow, and an expression of anguish in her quivering mouth, she flung herself down in a heap by the old man's side.

"Are you feeling ill, father?" she cried; "speak to me, just once." And while, with passionate iteration, she besought for the comfort of a human face which might ease her sick terror, George Moore looked vacantly at the clock and answered at last:

The doctor shook his head when he saw his patient's state; and he told them frankly that the old man would not live many hours longer —perhaps not more than twelve. He gave them a few simple directions, the gist of them being that the patient was to be disturbed as little as possible.

"You can do nothing?"

Azalea repeated the words mechanically, as she sat and stared at the dear face which was so soon to be—What? She scarcely knew. Something dark, awful, and tenebrific the familiar lineaments into awfulness.

All through the night George Moore lay motionless, turning upward eyes which seemed to reflect a deeper awe than that of the solemn shadows they gazed on. It was not until dawn that he spoke. Then he muttered,

"Azalea!"

She was at his side in an instant, and was in time to receive the only heritage he could bequeath her. Even as he looked a blessing on her pale face, the priceless gourde of endless peace was granted to his own.

Later in the day Captain Mowbray stood in the Auriel conservatory, wondering greatly why Azalea did not meet him as usual. He had come straight to this, their usual trysting-place, and had not heard of the tragedy which had been enacted in one of the chambers of the desolate house. Auriel was ordinarily so silent that even death could not intensify its calm.

Thurstan paced the dull red flags impatiently; but yesterday he had decided to relinquish the temptation of this girl's presence, and now it irked him that his temptation should not fall in his way so soon by ten minutes as he had expected. He had not decided on his plans for the future; he thought he should have to part from her very soon. He intended no evil, he would not act unfairly to her; but it would be brutal to leave her without a farewell and another kiss. Captain Mowbray suffered from the not uncommon delusion that kindness of manner expresses the matter which prays; but who cares how the knife is fashioned that gives the death-wound? If he visited Azalea in what coarse he should pursue in the future, he was quite certain that he craved her presence now; and he paced the dull red flags impatiently, and twitched spitefully at the weltered leaves that trembled with decay on the twisted vine-boughs overhead.

When at last Thurstan heard a light step rustle the dead leaves which the rain had clammed together on the threshold his face brightened, and he moved forward quickly, with his hands outstretched, and then he stopped, checked by the unwonted look in the girl's face.

"What is it? what has happened?" Thurstan said, anxiously.

Then, wildly, like an animal which, by the distress in its eyes, draws its master to the spot where its offspring lies hurt, the girl led her lover toward the chamber of death. And when Captain Mowbray learned what had happened, and found himself confronted by the unseeing serenity of the dead man's gaze; when he realized that, in the whole wide world, this desolate girl had no one but himself on whom to depend for protection—that the moment's good-nature he possessed owed to champion her cause; he could think no wrong to that helpless creature who, after one look of despair at the motionless form on the bed, came to his arms for comfort in her direst agony—for shelter from the tempestuous fate which was oppressing her. The young man felt his own face grow hot with tears as he strove to avert every thing misery in hers.

"Hush, my darling; hush; don't cry so. I will take care of you—I will love you all my life. Hush me, dear, and be comforted."

Idle words, but none the less honestly meant at the time. That night, when Captain Mowbray held his first interview with Azalea, the gentleman made a compact with the peasant now ennobled forever by the hand of God.

George Moore's dead shielded Azalea even more effectually than he could have done living. The dumb lips pleaded her cause with all the eloquence of speechlessness. The strangely lustrous eyes reflected Captain Mowbray's conscience in their light, and entreated mercy for the friendless survivor who had been so dear to the corpse while it was man.

"I will marry her," Captain Mowbray said, in answer to the silent interrogation of the dead. "Please God, I'll take good care of her and make her happy."

"Whether will Miss Azalea do," old Sally said, as the young man placed Azalea in her lodgings ere he left Auriel that night, "and what will become of her? Master Moore was a good as five shillings a week to me."

"Take good care of her, and I'll see that you are well paid," Thurstan said, hastily. Then he kissed Azalea's cold cheek and whispered that he would be with her early in the morning.

Thurstan smoked cigarettes with more than usual rapidity in his homeward walk to-night, in symptom with his train of mental perturbation.

"Yes," he mused, "I must marry her, I suppose; there is nothing else to be done that I can see: but I must confess it is not there'll be a devil of a row with my father and with my creditors."

Then he thought of Lady Di, and sighed. The face of an old love is never so vivid in our memory as when its place is about to be usurped by a new one.

"But, after all, this one is prettier, far prettier, and far fonder of me."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

WEDDED.

WHEN George Moore was buried, when that solemn presence had passed away from the house, Captain Mowbray was unspeakably freed, and moved with a gayer step. When he approached the Auriel portals it was a relief to him to think, when he looked up at the windows, that the little bedchamber was no longer tenanted by that soulless effigy of life. Captain Mowbray could fain have treated death as an ill-bred acquaintance; he would look another way if he met him, he would cut him when possible, ignore his presence when he could not. He was more injured than shocked when he saw the clownish fellow seize a gentleman's hand, whether the latter were willful or not, and lead him down into the shadows among all sorts of queer company.

The village pastor, an eccentric and accomplished man, who occasionally addressed eloquent homilies to himself (at least he was, as a rule, the sole member of his congregation capable of understanding any part of his sermons except the concluding blessing), took an unfair advantage of Captain Mowbray in the funeral sermon, which was preached the Sunday succeeding old Moore's burial. Thurstan had settled himself with a comfortable nap; he had assumed that air of profound attention which is the preface to somnolent oblivion; he had lowered his eyes from Azalea's tear-stained face, and was concentrating his gaze on his boots, when the concluding words of the preacher rang from the pulpit with the solemnity of a storm-bell, whose breath is resonant of shipwreck. He besought his hearers not to walk backward toward the dark road which is the halting-place of all the nations—not to be beguiled by a vain security into forgetting that grim jailer who will, sooner or later, fetter peasant and peer alike in gyves which no mortal hand may unlink.

"Look you, friends, be careful to amend ere the light stiffens in your eyes—ere the poor guilty heart is pulseless, and the lips vacant forever of their living tenant, the voice—ere you are a carcass for worms to eat and earth to cover as an unsightly object. Make your peace if ye may. Do not barter all for a small part, lest you in the last hour be seized with a pang keener than all life's pleasures were sweet. Infinite hope has been born within us; assuredly infinite misery will be its reward if we only seek it ere it is too late."

That evening, when Thurstan sought Azalea, he found her writing a letter, on which she soon fell fast. For the first time since this grief had come to her she was constrained to put it into verbal shape. She was telling Robert Douglas that her dear father was dead; and as she traced the letters which recalled to her that nevermore at dawn of sun or shut of eve would she receive greeting from that beloved face—that nevermore, whether in June or June or grim winter, would he note with her the full-orbed peonies blush midst the grasses of the lawn, or the rosetrees bud-to under the grip of frost—she more realised all this, the more keenly, perhaps, because the first dumb horror of her anguish was passing away, leaving her a prey to a host of sorries and tender regrets, Azalea felt that to gain back one blessed hour of her foster-father's companionship she would willingly endure the keenest penance that fate could devise. As she sat in the dim shadows of the saloon her wan cheeks and fair hair accorded well with the pallid solution of that faded chamber. Thurstan half started at her weird appearance; in the blur of the half-light she was as undefined as any other gloom.

"Don't sit so still," he said, hastily; 'you might as well be one of those creepy ghosts who are supposed to be partial to late hours and dark corners. I should prefer a sunshine myself, if I'd come up for underground. What are you doing?"

"I am writing to Robert," she said, softly, "to tell him—all about it, you know; I ought to have written before, but I forgot."

Thurstan put his hand caressingly round her throat: the soft curve of warm flesh and blood put all spectral horrors out of his head.

"Ah, darling," he whispered, "I want you to tell Douglas something else: I want you to tell him that you have promised to be mine—that you will be my wife as soon as possible. Will you say this, Azalea?—or stop! I had better write it myself."

Knowing one arm still about her he seized a pen with his disengaged hand, and, under the mingled influence of generosity and passion, wrote as follows:

"My dear Old Man,—Azalea has told you of her bereavement. I can't make up my mind not to leave her; and as the peculiarity of her lonely position makes it unfitting that our intimacy should continue on any other terms, I have come to make her my wife at once. I hope this will meet with your approbation. If it's all the same to you, I'd just as soon keep my marriage dark for a while, as I shall want a little time to prepare my father and my creditors for this news. I fear they'll be awfully cut up. I shall be back soon, so that we may make some plans as to what Azalea had best do when my leave is up; I am awfully fond of her, and I think that every thing will come square at last. I don't know that I should have made up my mind to settle down so soon, but I remembered your advice when I last saw you, and I also remembered that I owe a debt of gratitude. If I have in any way repaid it by doing the right thing by your friend, I am satisfied; the more so as it is certainly right to have such a pretty little girl so fond of one.

"Yours ever, T. M."

Thurstan sealed this letter without showing it to Azalea; he meant to post it at once, but forgot to do so for more than a week; and by the time it arrived at its destination Robert Douglas had departed from London, and was on his road to Australia.

He reached his cottage late one night, and let himself in unobserved. He went straight to his bedchamber, and seated with jealous care on the alabaster figure of Psyche, which the accumulated savings of weeks had enabled him to purchase; he could see that he had been absent, for deny himself all but the barest necessaries of life He felt himself quite repaid now as he looked at its pure loveliness, and pictured to himself Azalea's delight when she received this addition to her few treasures.

As his head beat fast with the great joy of his nearer proximity to her he forgot how unutterably weary had been the lonely hours he had passed by the sick-bed of his dying friend. He put it away from him—the sick longing, the heavy sighing which had seemed to weigh him to the dust in the arid desert of that time of silence. He could have sung with the birds, have laughed with the children he passed on the roadside. Had the stars of heaven been within his reach he would have plucked them from their cloudy settings and set them away in some unconscious of sport. So like a madman is the wisest of men when he is bewitched by the radiant insanity of love.

As yet he knew neither of Moore's death nor of Azalea's marriage. The former was dumb, deaf, and blind in yonder church-yard. And the girl—the final hope, the final joy, the one late blossom of Douglas's sterile heart—was sleeping with her head pillowed on her young husband's breast, comforted for her sorrow, and believing that fate could bring her no further woe now that the shield of his love would be evermore about her.

CHAPTER XXXV.

FIRE.

It was night—the night of Douglas's return home—and Azalea was still as a sepulchre.

It was the dumbest, stillest hour of the night, when a red tongue of flame made a sudden flash of light between the dark shadow of the wainscot at the foot of the old oak staircase. A smouldering beam which had long been threatening mischief behind the panels broke into glaring fury.

While death, the death of suffocation or of scorching agony, was creeping toward them, the pair in the bedchamber slept on, all unconscious. The girl was the first to awake; she awoke with the half-stifled feeling of sinking, as some one were gagging her; then she stared round with dazed eyes, and realized that death was in the room as well as by her bed.

"Thurstan," she moaned, "oh, Thurstan."

Then her terror found fuller voice, and she grasped him by the arm, crying:

"Wake up, Thurstan, wake up!"

She did not speak very loudly, but something in the desperate concentration of her tone stirred the sleeper.

"What's the row?"

He was wide awake now, sitting up like one startled to the sharpest attack of a foe, yet uncertain as to what quarter the stroke came from. A hot roll of smoke curling in under the door made him comprehend the nature of the danger. In an instant he was at the door, and, opening it cautiously, looked outside the room, shutting the door in place of a landing. Then he closed it, shaking his head, and went quickly to the window and threw it open. The ivy leaves which fringed the casement were steeped in dew and moonlight, the sweet-scented breath of night fanned his cheek into the awe-stricken eyes of the pair.

Azalea dropped one white arm in the forest of tawny, thick hair, and hid her face in her head.

"You see," she muttered under her breath, as if fearing lest the red, furious enemy without should hear and resent her words, "it wouldn't hold any thing heavier than a bird."

She held in her hand a crooked stem of ivy, pierced by a twig of hawthorn, which had torn at it critically. "It won't hold, but it may aid," he said, briefly. "Let us see."

He pulled at the leafy stem and counterpane, and by his voice and self-possessed manner steadied the girl's trembling hands while she assisted him to the best of her power.

"It is still nearly twenty feet from the ground," Thurstan said, when the string of blankets had been let down as far as it would go. "What's to be done now?"

What was to be done? Their eyes began to smart, the girl's face grew breathless; there was yet, however, no sign of resignation in Thurstan's face; manhood in its prime of warm blood, fair looks, and great love for this girl, will resign the mysterious gift of vitality: he would fight for life inch by inch, he swore in his pride, not when he looked at her, but he had not a spoken or implake took possession of him, and, with the experience of a sailor, he added:

"Please God."

He drew up the blankets again, and folding one round him, he made it secure to the bed.

Then he made another effort at the door; he could see nothing now, not even the shadow of the chess formed by the balusters of the landing-place. The smoke blinded and stifled him. The opposite wall was invisible; so were the melee-board, painted in black and adorned in side.

She was conscious that this awful moment might be shadowed by a yet greater despair.

"Douglas, love, beware," she muttered.

"Let us be together, whatever comes."

"It doesn't matter," he said, sadly. "This chance is not for me. Look!" The flames had got hold of the shelf at the opposite end, and were leaping toward them with ferocious gayety. A fresh cloud of smoke made them recoil before the shelter of the door. Then Thurstan closed it gently, as one who has felt a coffin lid over a dead face, and bore the girl back to her couch.

Through the open casement came hints of the quiet night. A distant church-bell tolled the hour; its monotonous sweetness had a strange hold of the shelf at the opposite end, and were leaping toward them with ferocious gayety. A fresh cloud of smoke made them recoil before the shelter of the door. Then Thurstan closed it gently, as one who has felt a coffin lid over a dead face, and bore the girl back to her couch.

M. EUGENE ROUHER.

M. ROUHER.

Eugene Rouher, Senator, late Minister of State, Minister of Finance, Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor, of the Orders of Leopold, the Black Eagle of Prussia, the Oak, St. Maurice and St. Lazarus, etc., is essentially a man of the Second Empire. His Imperialism is purely due to the force of events—family connections or political antecedents have in no way influenced the outset of his career, or determined his high advancement. Indeed, his early political convictions, if he had any—which appears doubtful—seem to have sympathized with Orleanism. Endowed with mental powers of a high order, he sought to enter early upon public life, and, conscious of his aptitude for real work, he resolved, on attaining the first step, to trust to circumstances to bear him on to the goal of his ambition.

Eugene Rouher was born at Riom, November 30, 1814. At the age of fourteen he was admitted a student at the Naval School of Angoulême; but, fortunately for him, the revolution of 1830 occurred, and the monarchy of July having suppressed that institution his prospects of a naval career were abandoned. On concluding his collegiate studies at Clermont he was sent to the great School of Law in Paris, "pour faire son droit," without which no Frenchman's education is considered complete. After being called to the bar he returned to Riom, where he soon acquired a good practice and considerable repute by defending the democratic cause in press prosecutions.

Elected, after the revolution of 1848, a representative for Le Puy-de-Dôme, he favored all measures devised to frustrate the policy of the "Party of Action."

Louis Napoleon, soon after his election to the Presidency, appointed M. Rouher Minister of Justice. From this period Rouher's aptitudes for parliamentary contention were established. He forced through the Chamber the bill known by the name of "Loi du 31 Mai," restricting universal suffrage. He introduced and carried the law limiting the liberty of the press. His name, however, does not appear once in connection with the events of the coup d'état. January 26, 1852, he was appointed Vice-President of the Council of State, and was charged with the administration of the section of Legislation, Justice, and Foreign Affairs. In this new sphere of action his characteristic talents and capacity for work manifested themselves in a conspicuous manner.

M. Rouher was successively President of the Commission of Pensions to aged persons, member of the Commission charged to distribute eight millions of francs in execution of the testamentary disposition of the Emperor Napoleon, and member of the Commission of the Universal Exposition of 1855. On the 3d of February in that year he accepted the port-folio of Agriculture, Commerce, and Public Works. Under his administration immense reforms have been accomplished, public works and improvements of every kind have been carried out all over the country. By a decree of the 17th of June, 1856, he was raised to the dignity of a Senator. In conjunction with Baroche he negotiated with Mr. Cobden the commercial treaty between France and England, which was signed on the 23d of January, 1860. The unexampled impetus given to French trade by the treaty has opened up prospects of prosperity far beyond the most sanguine expectations. Since 1860 he has negotiated the commercial treaties of France with Belgium, Prussia, the Zollverein, and Italy, all based on the same enlightened and liberal principles. On the 24th of June, 1867, ROUHER passed from the Ministry of Commerce to the Presidency of the Council of State, to whose functions was added the duty of explaining and defending the Legislative Measures in concert with the Minister of State, the projects of law and questions of policy submitted to its deliberations. Such was the close of the year he replaced, ad interim, M. BOUDET as Minister of the Interior. On the death of M. BILLAULT, ROUHER succeeded him in the Presidency. This position he has been recently compelled to resign, owing to the pressure of the Third Party in the Legislature. He has been called to the Presidency of the French Senate. M. ROUHER may justly be ranked among the great orators who have adorned the deliberative assemblies of France.

THE CINCINNATI ALMS-HOUSE.

CINCINNATI, Ohio, has the largest, the most beautiful, and the most commodious Alms-house in the world. The engraving on page 509 gives a very fair idea of the architectural beauty of this structure. In this, as in other public buildings recently erected, our Western cities are showing a very suggestive lesson to those in the East.

BALL'S EQUESTRIAN STATUE OF WASHINGTON, BOSTON.

THIS statue, recently erected in the Public Garden of Boston, of which we give on page 509 a faithful representation from a photograph by the eminent artist Mr. J. W. BLACK, had its origin in a general desire of Bostonians to have a suitable memorial of WASHINGTON by their fellow - citizen THOMAS BALL, the sculptor. A committee of prominent gentlemen was appointed, and Mr. BALL'S services secured. This was a little more than ten years ago. HON. ROBERT C. WINTHROP took an active interest in the work, and initiated the public movement by an address in the Music Hall, in which he expressed the belief that some artist would have occasion to repeat the Ball in motion." Soon afterward a fair was held which added twelve thousand dollars to the fund. The city government appropriated ten thousand dollars; a generous amount was contributed from the surplus fund of the Revere House, and the work was finally placed on a satisfactory basis. The model was completed in 1864, and the casting, in bronze, was intrusted to the Ames Manufacturing Company, at Chicopee, Massachusetts. The extreme length of the statue is 16 feet, height to the top of the head 13 feet, height of the horse 12 feet, height of pedestal 10½ feet. The pedestal, which is of Quincy granite, was designed by HAMLATT HILLARD, is 17 feet in length, 7½ feet in width, and 14 feet in height. The weight of the statue is 10,400 pounds, and the whole cost $34,400. It was unveiled to the public on the afternoon of July 3, 1869, and was presented to the city by HON. ALEXANDER H. RICE, Chairman of the Washington Statue Committee, in a brief and appropriate speech, MAYOR N. B. SHURTLEFF responding in behalf of the city. It is an ornament to the Public Garden, and an honor to Boston.

PEARL-FISHERY IN THE GULF OF CALIFORNIA.

PEARLS are found in the bay of La Paz, around the little islands at its entrance. The best fishing-ground is between the island of Spirito Santo and the port of Pichilingo. It can thus style a creek surrounded with a few bamboo huts, which is nevertheless the general rendezvous of the men interested in the pearl fishery for three months in the year, being abandoned the rest of the time to jackals and fever.

The pearl-oyster found in the Gulf of California differs slightly from that of the Gulf of Oman and the Eastern seas. The shell, moreover, presents two beautiful, almost circular, valves, resembling silver, and lined with a thick, dazzling, and polished mother-of-pearl, which, merely gave to the Gulf of California the name of the Vermilion Sea. The animal which has built this magnificent abode differs little at first sight from our edible oyster: and may, indeed, be eaten with impunity; it is not, however, agreeable to the taste—raw, it is slimy, bitter, and disgusting; while cooked, it is so hard that it is masticated with difficulty. The flesh, and that adheres to the shell, when thinly sliced and cooked with allspice, is very good eating, but extremely indigestible.

Pearl fishing was commenced in the Gulf of California in 1580, forty-six years after the discovery of the country, by the Jesuits, who discovered the placers and taught the Indians how to dive. From 1580 to 1855, or 275 years, the fishery yielded 1,911,300 cwts. of shells and 2770 pounds of pearls, worth about $3000 per pound. The average yield during 1855 and 1856 has been, therefore, about $50,000 worth of pearls a year. It is necessary to open about seven hundred cwts. of shells to obtain a pound of pearls.

The color of the pearl is very variable, and two are rarely found alike. They range from white to black, including every possible variety of tint, but all marked by the changeable reflections of light found in the mother-of-pearl. The most highly prized are spherical in shape; almond, nut, and pear shaped pearls are also very valuable. The one pearl, the largest ever found in the Gulf of California, is always pear-shaped.

The best season for pearl fishing is from the middle of May to the middle of August, when the indispensable conditions, viz., no breeze and a dead calm during part of the day, clear weather, and a cloudless sky, are usually found in the morning. At two o'clock in the afternoon the northeast wind springs up, and rain often comes on; the evenings, therefore, are the best seasons the morning's harvest.

Having obtained permission from the Government, which claims one-fifth of the profits, to fish on a certain space, the contractor repairs to Pichilingo, with a vessel laden with provisions, clothing, and trinkets, as bribes wherewith to engage the best divers. The conditions demanded are simply: board during the fishing season, and turn to their homes at the end thereof, and half the oysters before they are opened. The first few days are spent in the boats experimenting, by diving a little way below the surface and gradually increasing the time of their stay. After three or four trials the diver is master of himself. The average time of remaining under water is two minutes; some few stay three minutes, but never longer. At first the blood rushes from their nose, ears, and even eyes, on reaching the surface, through the compression of blood in the lungs. They sip no spirituous liquors then and abstain—wise. These sanguinary emissions soon cease, and those who do not exhibit reasonable health in their stay never bleed again.

At last all is ready; the women are settled in huts on the shore, the boats are provisioned, and the divers are insured to their task. The fishery opens with a solemn ceremony. A sorceress exercises the sun and the moon, and relates their past misdeeds, adjuring them to behave themselves in the future, for the sons of her tribe have lungs of steel, a heart of bronze, and an arm of iron.

The divers work in different ways. Some have a sort of net-bag, in which they put some of the oysters and leaves their hands free; others dive naked, and bring up the oysters under their left arm. The latter can remain under water up more than five or six oysters, and never more than twelve. Some boats have rowers, and others have none. Some are provided with sails, and others by a stone tied to a rope. Some of the divers go down with a stone, which is drawn up by the greater part by a rope attached to a plunging or rising; a few have a rope passed round their waist and fastened to the boat. Each is infested with monsters of the fish, the safest course seems to be to have perfect freedom of movement.

All the divers are armed with a short stick, or estaca, hardened in the fire and pointed at each end. This is their only tool, and with it they are allowed nothing with which they could open an oyster under water and hide its contents. In each boat is a large tub, in which are placed the oysters as they are brought up, and another at the bow to warn the divers of danger. In many there is a wooden grating, through which seagulls, who shrieks and raves, and, on the whole, frightens off the sharks by the noise she makes.

Good rowers, who can swim occasionally, are usually divided into two groups, working half an hour in turn. During this half hour the divers are duty hardly rest their head on the side of the boat, pass their oysters to the capataz, who throws them on their heap, take breath for a moment, and plunge again into the sea. This process experienced, or those who still bleed, are divided into three groups, and rest longer. They always dive facing from liquid and solids.

On reaching the bottom the diver rapidly detaches the oysters about him with the aid of his estaca, if need be, then rises to the surface. But the opportunities for fraud are numerous. If he sees a shell gaping for a moment, he will by introducing the estaca crosswise, and if he finds nothing, comes up with an oyster or two, saying that they were all he found. Some men can stay under water three minutes open a shell every time, for the pearl-oyster is easily opened. They are soon acquainted with all the tricks, and can detects the fraud by finding the end of the estaca notched or broken. The pearls thus abstracted are either conveyed or taken ashore at the first opportunity. The first operation is easy; but the pearls are greatly injured by passing through the digestive canal. The shell, moreover, is worth the pearl all its brilliancy; but it needs extraordinary skill for a diver to open an oyster, extract the pearl, secure it, and again close the two oysters not to rise empty-handed, all in two minutes.

About noon they return to land. Each man divides his pile into two parts, and gives the contractor his choice, keeping the remaining share. Some open all in the spot to avoid the trouble and risk of opening, acting on the principle that a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush. The shells belong to the contractor.

There are two ways of opening the oyster: the first consists in doing it immediately with a knife; this is favored by contractors, for they can who have time and money. The pearls obtained in this way are much more beautiful. The second method, employed by the Indians, who open their shells, is to let them open of themselves by putrefaction. The mollusks are then torn out one by one, and thrown into a large vessel, and the shells to which a pearl adheres are laid aside, and the whole family, eagerly bending over the trough, sift the mismatic mass through their fingers. This process generates grave and often mortal diseases. In the fishing season a blind pilot could find his way to the port of Pichilingo by the horrible stench which exhales from it.

The Indians who are fortunate enough to find costly pearls waste their money on the spot, and are the same poor wretches they were as poor as before. As to the contractors, their expenses are heavy and their risks great; what with their vessels, crew, and at least sixty divers and their families, whom they have to feed, it is impossible to undertake the business with less than ten thousand dollars; and such a man with ten thousand dollars in those countries can find much pleasanter means of investing his capital; the competition, therefore, is very limited.

Attempts have been made at cultivating the pearl-oyster, but where they have been made to live, as in Sweden, the shell has lost its brilliancy, proving that the rays of the tropical sun, which are indispensable to the pearl, are needed to give its radiant tints. In the culture of the pearl-oyster a tropical latitude, a calm sea, a special demand, and a very intelligent race of divers between the shells and the sun are needed; and then pearls are only found in oysters seven years old.

We must say a few words about the monsters which infest the seas, and which, at other times beloken sore to the fishers at La Paz, swarm there at the pearl-diving season. The sharks are little dreaded; being obliged to turn over before they can seize their prey, the divers, warned by the clamor from their friends on the boat, have time to escape; or, if attacked, they extend their hand, engaging the monster in his jaws; the shark bites violently; the hardened wood resists him, which are very tender, and he lets go his victim with a howl of pain. It is a mistake to suppose that sharks scent sickness on board a ship, and follow it in the wake in the expectation of devouring a corpse; a body thrown into the sea is always weighted; and as the shark can not dive, and is obliged to turn over in order to bite, the prey is out of his reach before he can attack it.

But if the Indians care little for the shark, it is not so with the dreaded tiburon, whose name is or utters without a shudder. There are two kinds of tintoreras; the first is called by the natives cornuda (or cornuted shark, which it resembles in general appearance. It is far more dangerous, however, for it swims between two waves, and has its mouth at the end of the muzzle instead of underneath, so that it is not obliged to turn over in order to bite. The second, or the tintorera proper, is the terror of the poor seagull-fish (an odd kind of angels!), and as a huge, broad, flat fish, which can be compared to nothing better than a gigantic blanket. Both, fortunately, swim slower than the shark, which enables the diver to escape them when the boat is not far off.

These monsters are eager for human flesh, and extremely dangerous through their facility for procuring it. They devise their name, tintorera, or dyer, from a dark, viscous fluid which they emit from their bodies, and which seems to have a stupefying effect. The prima eats nothing but living flesh, while the tintorera feeds only on purifying bodies. The latter is very phosphorescent, and easily seen at night. He flattens itself on the sand and waits for the prey. The first unhappy diver who comes near sees a new waiter rising to him, and feels his limbs paralyzed by a magnetic influence. The monster envelops him and smothers him as if in a blanket, then rips him away, and covers himself and his prey with sand. The work of putrefaction soon begins, and, ghoul-like, the monster devours the corpse at his leisure. The latter drama makes a strong impression on the minds of the divers, who see something supernatural in the physiognomy and magnetic power of the tintorera. The prima is about ten feet in length; the tintorera covers a space from five to thirteen feet long. Both have several rows of teeth, like the shark, planted not in the maxillaries, but on the lips. There are also the s word-fish and the sierra, or the saw-fish, and the devil-fish of Victor Hugo. The latter, though sometimes huge in size, inspires the divers with little terror; they sometimes even catch it and use it for food.

SUPERSTITION OF MUSIC.

WE hear of horrid sects at present in Russia, practicing many of the most shocking and horrible sacrifices, and the Russian papers give sometimes most shocking details of these sects. It is a strange thing how faith may be perverted, and how to minister to the worst passions. The "Communion of the Flesh of the Lamb" and the "Communion of the Blood of the Lamb" really seem to have been invented by the lowest demons of the bottomless pit. The subject is too revolting to be pursued into detail; it is enough to say, that an infant seven days old is bandaged over the eyes, stretched over a dish, and a silver spoon thrust into the side, so as to pierce the heart. The elect suck the child's blood—that is "the Blood of the Lamb." The body is then roasted, and given to the elect for food, then crushed into powder, and eaten in small cakes. That is "the Flesh of the Lamb." We mention this particularly for stating these frightful things, but they are actually occurring in Russia in 1869.

SUPPRESSION OF GAMBLING IN EUROPE.

IT has long been a vexed question whether the interests of morality would be better served by suppressing or continuing to tolerate the gambling establishes which are found in a few parts of the European continent; the advocates of suppression taking their stand on the immorality of legalizing what they are pleased to term sins of vice and iniquity, while the partisans of toleration assert that the less evil is to be apprehended from a system of gambling conducted fairly and under Government surveillance than from the unlicensed and clandestine tripots to which players would resort if deprived of the facilities which at present exist for the indulgence of their passions. As the latter are now doomed to be suppressed at the expiration of their present leases; a recent vote of the Belgian Chambers has fixed the 31st of October, 1871, as the date on which "Fatal Zero" shall cease up for the last time in Spa; and now a petition, signed by 1500 inhabitants of Nice, has been presented to the French Senate praying that body to use its influence to procure the suppression of the great strong-hold of gambling at Monaco. Should their efforts be successful the English settlement in Heligoland will be the last refuge of the lovers of rouge-et-noir and roulette.

INFLUENCE OF THE MOON.

MR. R. H. PATTERSON, in one of the magazines, says that Professor Palmieri, who has so closely studied the phenomena of Vesuvius, declares that there is a perceptible relation between the phases of the moon and the developments of volcanic action. Any one who has lived in the South, or even sailed in the Mediterranean, may have noticed how carefully sleepers in the open air guard their head and face against the rays of the moon, to avert ophthalmia and other ills. In India, most exposed to the moon-rays immediately neutralize. The moon's influence on tides and ocean currents in the atmosphere just as it does in the ocean. Some of these facts indicate a lunar action more subtle than science can yet account for.

LOSSING'S FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812. The Pictorial Field-Book of the War of 1812; or, Illustrations, by Pen and Pencil, of the History, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the last War for American Independence. By BENSON J. LOSSING, Author of "The Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution." With 882 Illustrations, engraved on Wood by Lossing & Barritt, chiefly from Original Sketches by the Author. Complete in One Volume, 1084 pages, Royal 8vo. Price, in Cloth, $7 00; Sheep, $8 50; Full Roan, $9 00; Half Calf or Half Morocco extra, $10 00.

Sold by Agents.

At the close of his PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION, Mr. Lossing said: "Should time deal gently with me, we may again go out with pencil and scrip together upon the great highway of our country's progress, the march of events and men." The implied promise has been fulfilled. More than ten thousand miles of the country over which he passed the author has traveled, with note-book and pencil in hand, visiting the scenes of historic interest connected with the War of 1812, from the great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, gathering, recording, and delineating every thing of special value not found in books, and making himself familiar with the intellectual side of that war. Access to the archives of government, state and national, and to private collections, was also given him; and from the lips of actors in the events of that struggle he received the most important information concerning it, which might have perished with them.

The results of the author's researches and labors are given in one very large volume of 1084 double-column pages, containing eight hundred and eighty-two engravings in the style of the FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION, to which this magnificent work is an indispensable companion. It takes up the narrative of historic events where the former work leaves it, and in a careful manner gives a lively account of the results of the country immediately succeeding the Revolution; that period when the new nation with its allied powers of the British and Indians in the Northwest; the origin and growth of political parties in the United States, and their relations to the War of 1812; the influence of the French Revolution and of French politics in giving complexion to parties in the country; the first war of the Republic; the effects of the wars of Napoleon on the public policy of the United States; the Embargo and Kindred Acts; and the kindling of the war in 1812.

The events of the war are given in greater detail than in any work ever published on the subject, and the narrative from the new actors in the scenes whose deeds have not been hitherto recorded. On this account it is specially interesting to many of the descendants of the country.

The illustrations of this superb work are similar in character to those of the FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION. The construction of the narrative differs from that only in having historical events arranged in chronological order. It forms a continuation of the history of our country from the close of the Revolution, in 1783, to the end of the second war with Great Britain, in 1815. Nothing has been spared by the author and publishers in their endeavors to make it the most perfect, attractive, and useful volume on the subject ever offered to the public.

IMPROVED ALUMINUM BRONZE HUNTING-CASED WATCHES.

The Improved Aluminium Bronze is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. Its qualities and resemblance to Gold are such that even judges have been deceived. It has seriously accepted the attention of scientific men, and has not only escaped forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition.

The movements are well finished, perfectly regulated, and as the cases are of the same metal, they will last a lifetime. In fact, I am enabled to warrant them an excellent timekeeper.

"THESH AS A MAIDEN'S BLUSH" is the pure peachy complexion which follows the use of HAGAN'S MAGNOLIA BALM. It is the true secret of beauty. Fashionable ladies in society understand this.

The Magnolia Balm changes the rustic country girl into a city belle more rapidly than any other one thing.

Redness, Sunburn, Tan, Freckles, Blotches, and all effects of the summer sun disappear when it is used, and a genial, cultivated, fresh expression is obtained, which rivals the bloom of youth. Beauty is possible to all who will invest 75 cents at any respectable store and insist on getting the Magnolia Balm.

MEDAL PRESENTED TO MIDSHIPMAN MASON.

IN our issue for April 24 we gave a portrait of young Midshipman T. BAILEY MYERS MASON, who on the 8th of February saved the lives of two seamen of the Guerriere, off Rio Janeiro. On that day Mr. MASON was sent ashore in charge of the steam launch of the Guerriere, to search for and bring off the men who were on liberty. Five of the men were found and placed in the launch, and being intoxicated and riotous were put in irons. One of them jumped overboard with his irons on, and would have been drowned had not Mr. MASON jumped after him and rescued him, with imminent peril to himself. Scarcely had Mr. MASON got aboard with his man than another, also in irons, jumped overboard; and although Mr. MASON was greatly exhausted by his first effort, he jumped after and rescued him. For these two acts of gallantry he was most highly commended by his commanding officer, by the Admiral of the station, and by the Secretary of the Navy; and the Life Saving Benevolent Association of New York ordered a gold medal to be struck in his honor, and to be presented to him. Shortly after the arrival of the Guerriere at this port the medal, of which we give an illustration on this page, was presented to MASON by the Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER, who read to him the following letter:

LIFE SAVING BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK, No. 11 WALL STREET, July 21, 1868.

To T. BAILEY MYERS MASON, Middletown:

DEAR SIR,—This association has inscribed on one of its gold medals the following testimonial: "Presented to Midshipman T. BAILEY MYERS MASON, of the United States Navy, who, with generous heroism, twice in succession, hazarding his own life, recovered from drowning two of his shipmates, enlisted men of the Guerriere, in the harbor of Rio de Janeiro, February 8, 1869." The signal acts of unselfish gallantry thus sought to be commemorated have their chief reward in the consciousness that, upon the impulses of a humane and noble courage, you delivered from sudden death two human lives. They have also been recognized in the report of your superior officers, and the special commendations of the Secretary of the Navy, and we would not attempt to supersede or add to the high meed of praise thus awarded by the nation through its official representatives. But it is one of the chartered privileges of our Association to encourage meritorious conduct in the discharge of the sacred duty of saving lives exposed at perpetuate its just appreciation of acts of self-sacrifice and heroism. In obedience to this the Association herewith transmitted for the so inscribed, and to be fully, your obedient servant,

ROYAL PHELPS, Secretary.

MEDAL PRESENTED TO MIDSHIPMAN T. B. M. MASON BY THE LIFE SAVING BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK.

Mr. BEECHER followed with a few appropriate words, to which young MASON made a modest and brief reply. After the presentation of the medal Admirals STRINGHAM and DAVIS stepped forward and shook hands with MASON, complimenting him on the honor he had received. The medal is of fine gold, and is worth at least $40.

MERCANTILE LIBRARY, PHILADELPHIA.

THE Mercantile Library of Philadelphia, having outgrown its quarters on Fifth Street, below Chestnut, has been removed to a large building on Tenth Street, above Chestnut.

The new premises were inaugurated on July 15, with speeches from the President, T. MORRIS PEROT, Esq., BENJAMIN H. BREWSTER, Esq., and others.

Members and visitors have free access to the books. The amount of loss to the property of the Company is found to be very inconsiderable under this system—far less than would be represented by the expense of hiring clerks to wait upon the public.

In a circular issued by the President of the Company it is stated that the library contains about 50,000 volumes, and is constantly receiving accessions of new American and foreign works; and in order more fully to supply the wants of readers, many copies of popular books are procured; and there is in successful operation a system by which, for a small sum, books are delivered at the residence of members.

The reading-rooms, located in a secluded part of the building, are spacious and convenient, and are furnished with about 150 reviews, magazines, and papers. They offer advantages for reading and quiet study such as never could be enjoyed at the old building, and such as are seldom found in institutions of this kind.

The newspaper-room, which occupies the second story, and is wholly separated from the library proper, is supplied with nearly 200 newspapers (American and foreign), representing all political and commercial interests. The chessroom, in the second story of the building, is furnished with twenty-four tables.

TENNESSEE AND MISSISSIPPI.

THE Republican party at its last National Convention declared that it favored "the removal of the disqualifications and restrictions imposed upon the late rebels.....as may be consistent with the safety of the loyal people." This is a plain statement of what the tendency of the party policy should be. It is no more than that, because it is impossible to provide an exact rule for determining when and where and how the disloyalty is disappearing. Undoubtedly the total disfranchisement of a multitude of intelligent voters is a cause of considerable irritation and disaffection; but it does not, therefore, follow that a universal political restoration would be wise, because the peril of giving disaffected persons lawful control of a government may be much greater than that of disfranchisement. The question at any time, and in any State, is wholly one of expediency, and it is peculiarly so in the unreconstructed States of the Union.

But the policy of reconstruction, of which the suffrage of the freedmen is so vital a point, evidently contemplates a rapid political restoration of the whole disaffected population of those States. It was felt that a long disfranchisement of the late dominant class would be unsafe to see in what other way the complicated difficulties of the situation could have been so readily adjusted. The happy result of the new system was so clearly seen by the Convention that nominated General GRANT that it did not hesitate to pronounce, in the words that we have quoted, for the speediest possible removal of disabilities.

It was not, however, surprising that in the States themselves there should have been very warm and serious differences. The bitter local and personal hostilities of the war, enormously embittered by the events that succeeded it, and by the conduct of ANDREW JOHNSON, prevented unanimity of sentiment among professed loyal men, so that a division of the loyal party was probable, and has occurred. This division also was determined by the very question we are considering—that of the policy of political restoration. The Virginia immediate political restoration. The Virginia the late electing turned upon the point of entire amnesty, and the result there has undoubtedly settled the question in the other States where it is not yet formally disposed of. Indeed, the position of the party at large, and the tendency of public opinion generally, had virtually decided it; and even in Virginia Mr. WELLS was understood to have conceded the necessity of amnesty. In the uncertainty, however, enough Republicans voted for Mr. WALKER to elect him, and the Fifteenth Amendment has been secured, with general amnesty.

There is now really no reason for further division in the Republican party of the unreconstructed States; and those who act with its opponents, and thus conspire to weaken the party and the Administration, should be very suspiciously watched. Thus, in Tennessee, there is a fierce contest in the party. Neither of the candidates was regularly nominated, and there is apparently very little to choose between them politically, as neither were original Union men. Nor is there any essential difference between the platforms, as both declare for amnesty. Under these circumstances, and to withdraw from the scene of the contest, it seems to us that the sympathies of Republicans elsewhere naturally incline to the candidate who is supported by the great body of their friends, as against him who is sustained by all their enemies. If the friends of Mr. STOKES declare for amnesty, and heartily support all the other measures of the party, why should a Republican elsewhere rejoice in the favorable prospects of Mr. SENTER, who also declares for amnesty, and who, if successful, must be elected by the votes of those who as heartily oppose the measures of the party? In other words, why should a Republican wish to see his party succeed in Tennessee by the votes of its enemies when he knows that their object is not the triumph of Republican principles? Does he fear the Greeks less because they bring gifts? If, in Virginia, Mr. WALKER and Mr. WELLS had represented the same principles and policy as Mr. STOKES and Mr. SENTER do in Tennessee, should we not all have preferred to see Mr. WELLS succeed by the Republican vote rather than Mr. WALKER by that of our opponents?

The question is still more emphatic in Mississippi. In that State the Republican party is well organized and harmonious, and it is supported by a larger proportion of native white men than in most of the Southern States. The Republican platform is liberal and wise, declaring against proscription and disfranchisement, and favoring universal suffrage and universal amnesty. There are very few, and only a very few, Republicans who have withdrawn to ally themselves with the Democrats in a movement called "Conservative" Republicanism. This alliance has nominated Judge DENT for Governor, whose claim to be considered a citizen of the State consists, as we understand, in the fact that, in 1866, he occupied an abandoned plantation in Coahoma County; but, his enterprise proving unsuccessful, he left the State at the close of the year. His nomination, like the alliance, would seem to be a device of the enemy to conquer under other colors than their own. But can any loyal party see any good reason for withdrawing national Republican sympathy from the Mississippi Republican party, which stands firmly upon the national platform? Certainly there is no reason, if there is no reason. If he could have truly said that those whom his candidacy opposes advocate a restrictive and proscriptive policy, he might have shown the wisdom of supporting his nomination. But he could not do it, and of course he did not attempt it. It was probably supposed that a letter from the present Executive of the President, and as WALKER'S election in Virginia was called a triumph of the President's policy, his candidacy would be regarded as simply recognizing the same principles, and as involving the sympathy and support of the Administration.

The circumstances, however, being absolutely different, we warn our friends in Mississippi that the resemblance must not be assumed. The President of the United States is not to be held responsible for declarations upon the subject, nor should we wish him to do so. His sympathy, however, naturally belongs to those who maintain the principles upon which he was elected, including that generous disposition which the Chicago platform expressly asserts. And who maintain those principles in Mississippi? Those who would be elected for Mr. SEYMOUR, and who denounce the whole policy of reconstruction, or those whose votes were sure for GRANT and COLFAX? It seems to us plain that the national Republican press should distinctly sustain by its sympathy the party in Mississippi which has proved its faith in the principles that it professes, and which is not narrow and proscriptive, and which supports equal rights not from compulsion but from conviction. Our principles and our policy are vitally safer with our friends than with our enemies.

CUBAN AFFAIRS.

In speaking of Senator SUMNER'S opposition to any relaxation of neutrality in the Cuban question, the Tribune very justly remarks that the Alabama question has nothing to do with it. Our neutral duties do not depend upon the Alabama claims. The Tribune also says: "We do not suppose, however, that the Senator desires the inference to be drawn that merely for a selfish aim of our own we should sacrifice a struggling cause." It is hardly to speak in this instance for the Senator, and to answer, certainly not. But if the faithful observance of neutrality involves the sacrifice of a cause which ought to succeed, our duty is evident—we ought to recognize the belligerence or the independence of Cuba. The question of Cuban independence, however, is very different from that of the relation of the United States to the Cuban revolution. It does not follow, because the Cubans are justified in maintaining their independence, that the United States authorities would be justified in evading the laws of the country to help them. And this point has been curiously confused in the whole of the recent discussion; and those who have denounced the President for not privately instructing his deputies to connive at the violation of honorable law which he was sworn to execute have certainly a very remarkable conception of official honor and of national rectitude.

If, instead of arresting the officers of the United States for enforcing the laws, the Cuban Junta had been advised to confine themselves wholly to securing the recognition of Cuban belligerence, we are not sure that they might not have succeeded. But they have been advised that the sympathy of the people would shut the Neutrality laws and the law would be enforced, and that they might make war from the United States. It was bad advice, for two reasons. In the first place, the events and the character of the sympathy have been erroneously represented to the Cubans; and, in the second place, it is a great mistake that any large part of the American people will complacently see their laws openly defied, except, as in the case of the Fugitive Slave law, from a profound conviction of the wickedness of the law and the practical impossibility of its repeal. Nobody believes that the Neutrality laws are wicked; and if their operation is ever likely to sacrifice a just cause, the remedy is immediate.

The dispersion of the RYAN expedition seems to have settled, at least for the present, the question of warlike movements from this port. Meanwhile the news from Cuba is as unsatisfactorily vague as ever. But the situation apparently remains substantially unchanged. The essential reasonableness of the revolution, however, and the disorganization of the struggle, have led to various propositions of a peaceful solution. One of these is, that Cuba shall buy itself, with the United States as indorser—and, we presume, broker. This last is the important point of the proposition.

If the United States proposes merely to guarantee to Spain the purchase-money, upon condition that Spain will sell, the affair is simple enough. But we presume that, as a preliminary, Spain would require that arms should be laid aside, that her new policy for the island should be announced and understood, and that an honest vote should be taken.

But would the United States be content to make the proposition merely, and politely withdraw if Spain should reply that it was not inclined to do the bargain? Or would the envoy suggest peculiar reasons for compliance, reasons that are obvious enough? And if he should, what would the whole proceeding be but a more carefully veiled Ostend policy? If the United States say to Spain, "We shall be glad to guarantee the terms that the Cubans may propose," well. But if the United States say, "If you don't accept the terms, and us as security, we must really acknowledge the belligerence or the independence of Cuba," it would be a very courteous, but a very unmistakable coercion.

Of course the result is evident. Cuba has no money, and if the bargain is made the United States would advance the money. Cuba would be virtually mortgaged to the United States as security, and on some not distant day Cuba would be asked to satisfy the mortgage. The grandeur and magnanimity of such a scheme are not apparent. It would, indeed, be magnanimous for us to concede the independence of Cuba. It would be a magnanimity unprecedented in history. It would also be becoming in the United States to propose such a concession in the interest of justice and peace, provided it carefully refrained from annexation afterward. It would also be a good thing to save bloodshed and the waste of money, and, of course, by guaranteeing its payment. But that the United States should be the broker of a bargain by which they expected to gain is to force a subject into a forced congratulation that that they paid sundry millions of dollars for Alaska.

THE ENGLISH TRADES-UNION BILL.

THE Trades-Union bill, which is favored by Parliament, and which even the London Times welcomes, is the breaking of another feudal chain. It is simply an assertion of the freedom of bargain for labor. The state, which has renounced the folly of attempting to fix the price of other commodities, now agrees that it will not attempt to regulate that of labor. Combination of labor is as lawful as those of capital. If, indeed, they become conspiracies to invade the rights of others, they may justly be punished, but otherwise they are, in the certain instances, be huge mistakes. They may react to the injury of the workman. But it is not the business of government to defend him against his own folly, as political economy more than to furnish him bread. He must instruct himself by thought and experience, as he must feed himself by industry.

By the present common-law of England, if the workmen of a factory agree to work only upon such terms as their employer will grant them, they are guilty of what is unlawful. Their agreement is void, and all that depends upon it. Therefore, if they form a mutual aid society, with rules and penalties, and one who has sworn to support them while waiting for their terms of work to be accepted, and the funds are stolen, they can not sue for the theft. If those who have agreed not to work, except upon certain terms, attempt to hold their fellows to their engagement without any specific breach of law, they are liable to imprisonment for a misdemeanor. Then comes the statute law which punishes "intimidation," "molestation," or "obstruction," leaving those elastic terms to be interpreted by judicial authority; and that has already decided that the statute covers the following cases: respectful notice to an employer that the workmen will leave at the end of their contract, unless a certain workman is dismissed; to tell a workman that he will be considered "a black sheep" if he does not "black sheep!" to workmen going to a shop; to tell a workman that if he goes to work "there will be a row;" coercion not extending to abusive language or gestures; a public notice to workmen not to engage with a particular master. These are exceptional crimes for workmen only; and it is not surprising that the common-sense of England demands a change.

According to Mr. FREDRIC HARRISON, to whom we owe these facts, the present bill, which was prepared by Mr. THOMAS HUGHES and Mr. MUNDELLA, asks no new law whatever. It merely proposes the removal of a bad old law. The ordinary law of assault remains unchecked; and assault in law means to offer to do any bodily hurt, even by gesture, when the means of hurting are present; and an assault in pursuance of any conspiracy is still punishable by two years' imprisonment. The reform proposed, therefore, is twofold: it abolishes the interference of criminal law in matters which ought not to be felt, and it abolishes one form of class legislation. It is also a recognition of the Trades' Unions, as entitled to the rights of all voluntary associations for legitimate purposes; and it is a renunciation of the right of government to regulate the methods by which those associations shall be furthered, while the rights of others are actually infringed. It is, in fact, another of the measures by which radical changes are being peacefully accomplished in England.

POLITICS MADE EASY.

A lively gentleman in Buffalo, who signs himself "A Republican Office-holder," has written a letter upon the relation of officeholders to politics, which is very comical reading. "It is asking too much," he says, "of private citizens occupied by the cares of complicated business matters to be constantly attending to the details of political machinery. They do their duty when they give their sympathy, their money, and, at the proper time, their vote, and to others must be left the preliminary work." This is truly a labor-saving system. There are those, indeed, who will think that the business of the custom-house and of the revenue officers is to collect the revenue, and of the United States marshals to execute the laws of the United States. But the Buffalo office-holder correspondent corrects their mistake. The persons, he informs us, who are appointed to collect the customs and assess the taxes are to make nominee candidates for office, and use "private citizens" are to vote for them and to pay all expenses.

Nothing could be easier—for the managers. Of course the office-holders would do it all for love. They would have no private axes to grind. They would select all the candidates for their ability and fitness, and without the slightest reference to their friendship for the office-holders. There would be no understandings, no arrangements, no "Central Committees" which the "General Committees" dictated their subordinates to the office-holders, and the officeholders nominated the candidates for the Committees, very much as plenty from one kind of collusion, and the public service in the mean while would be immensely benefited.

The correspondent complains that the city papers ridicule the energy, organization, and disinterestedness of all who subordinately work to sustain the party in power." But if by these fine words he means such a system as he proposes, what is ridicule for except to expose it? The "private citizens" attending to their business justly expect the custom-house and revenue officers to attend to theirs. If it is desirable to have a certain number of persons to manage politics, let them be devoted to that business. But the officers of the United States are employed for other duties. "A Republican Office-holder" writes in good faith, and does not seem conscious that he is proposing the most pernicious system of political corruption. He would reduce Mr. MARCY'S "spoils" theory to a science.

It is one thing, however, we fully agree with him. "A man," he says, "who holds a government office, and faithfully performs its duties, is as honorable as if he were working for any party in power." Undoubtedly; and when he leaves those duties to manage politics for the rest of us, he makes the faithful performance of his duties impossible. He is undoubtedly to take his part with his fellow-citizens in the government. But he may be very sure that the "Republican Office-holder" and the "Democratic" State of New York will never be "private citizens" as they are "private citizens" care no more for its welfare than to vote for candidates of whom they know nothing but that they are nominated by those who are selfishly interested in the success of the ticket.
